PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 86th CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1959

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, we thank Thee for the world in which Thou hast housed us as royal children, and for all that makes it beautiful and fair.

We are grateful to Thee for the life with which Thou hast endowed us, and for all that makes it a channel of uplift to others, and for all that brings its durable satisfactions to ourselves.

Grant, we beseech Thee, O Lord, even in the desecrated earth plowed by fear and hatred, that with high courage we may sow the seed of truth and love and freedom, believing in its ultimate fruition and fulfillment according to Thine eternal purposes.

In Thine own good time bring the harvest foreseen in radiant dreams of a redeemed earth, and while we toil in tribulation may we fight the good fight against the powers of darkness, in sweet contentment and with a quiet mind, knowing that though weeping may endure for a night, joy cometh in the morning.

We ask it in the name of Him who came to reveal the dignity and worth of our common human nature and its oneness with the Divine. Amen.

I am informed that the minority views on the labor bill are due tomorrow. I expect to speak to the chairman of the subcommittee handling that proposed legislation. There will be a Democratic policy committee meeting tomorrow. I anticipate that the labor bill will be discussed at the policy committee meeting, and plans will be made to schedule it for consideration by the Senate at an early date. I would not expect any votes to be taken on that bill this week.

I make this announcement so that Senators may know what our tentative plans are; and I shall discuss them in detail with the minority leader as soon as I can be more definite.

SELECTION OF SENATOR MORTON, OF KENTUCKY, TO BE CHAIRMAN OF THE REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, last week the Republican National Committee assembled in Washington and selected a new national chairman in the person of our very distinguished and esteemed colleague, the Honorable THRUSTON MORTON, of Kentucky. Quite a number of comments have been made in regard to his appointment which I shall ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

I should like to amplify my own comments, Mr. President, by saying that it was my pleasure to serve in the House of Representatives with THRUSTON MORTON. I followed his career when he served as an Assistant Secretary of State, and I watched with interest his advent to this body and his legislative career here. He is in deed and in fact a very distinguished citizen, a solid legislator, and a most competent organizer; and I think the Republican National Committee has well and wisely chosen in making him the chairman of the national committee.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the comments which I send to the desk be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENTS BY REPUBLICAN SENATORS ON THE ELECTION OF SENATOR THRUSTON B. MORTON AS REPUBLICAN NATIONAL CHAIRMAN

Senator JOHN SHERMAN COOPER, MORTON'S Kentucky colleague, has worked closely with the new chairman for many years—both in political campaigns and in the executive and legislative work of the Government. Senator COOPER said today:

"I am very happy about the selection of my colleague and friend, Senator THRUSTON B. MORTON, of Kentucky, as National Chairman of the Republican Party. He will bring to his work a distinguished record of experience as a businessman, veteran, Assistant Secretary of State, and as a Member of the House and Senate.

"Senator MORTON has great ability, and I am confident that his leadership will give purpose and vigor to the Republican Party."

In publicly urging the new chairman's selection, COOPER had been quick to point out that in Kentucky support for MORTON was enthusiastic and unanimous, saying: "He is vigorous and able, and will make a great chairman."

Senator LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, of Massachusetts, chairman of the Republican conference of Senators, stated: "This is a fine choice. Senator THRUSTON MORTON is particularly well-suited for the exacting and important tasks of the national chairman. His energy, judgment, and wide practical experience in the legislative and executive branches as well as in grassroots politics will enable him to serve well—with strength and imagination—both the Republican Party and the Nation."

Senator EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN, Senate minority leader, stated: "THRUSTON MORTON will make a good chairman."

Senator STYLES BRIDGES, chairman of the Republican policy committee, commented:

I extend my heartiest congratulations to the members of the Republican National Committee who today have chosen Senator THRUSTON B. MORTON to be their chairman. They have made an excellent choice.

"Having served in both Houses of Congress and in the executive branch, Senator MORTON is well-informed on all matters of concern to the American people. He is young, vigorous, able, personable, experienced—and a seasoned political warrior as well. I anticipate he will give the Republican Party the sound, hard-hitting leadership needed to rally all thoughtful Americans around the GOP banner.

"Senator MORTON comes from traditional Republican stock and is well-grounded in the principles which have made our party a party of freedom and responsibility.

"I wish Senator MORTON success in his new post and pledge my cooperation in the team effort to elect a Republican President and a Republican Congress in 1960."

Senator THOMAS H. KUCHEL, of California, minority whip, had the following to say concerning the election of Senator MORTON:

"The selection of THRUSTON MORTON is both good news and good sense.

"A vigorous suporter of the Eisenhower administration, in which he served with distinction before coming to the Senate, he has been in the vanguard of Eisenhower stalwarts in the Congress.

"Under his direction, a fair and square Republican Convention is assured.

"Senator MORTON can be expected to provide dynamic leadership and to carry forward with dedicated zeal the program undertaken by his predecessor, Meade Alcorn, to put our party in readiness for a no-punches-pulled campaign in 1960."

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin: "I am delighted that my distinguished colleague, Senator MORTON, has been selected to serve as chairman of the Republican Party. In this important post, I believe he will provide the kind of vigorous, astute, and constructive leadership that will be good for the Republican Party and for the country. Naturally, I am expecting 'great results'."

Senator MILTON R. YOUNG, of North Dakota: "In my opinion the selection of Senator THRUSTON MORTON as chairman of the Republican National Committee is a good choice. Senator MORTON will make one of the better national chairmen we have had in recent years. He has much to commend him."

Senator JOHN J. WILLIAMS, of Delaware: "THRUSTON MORTON is admirably qualified to take over the reins of the Republican National Committee, and I am delighted at his election."

Senator KARL E. MUNDT, of South Dakota: "My congratulations and best wishes to Senator MORTON in his selection as the national chairman of the Republican National Committee. I am confident that THRUSTON MORTON will bring to the committee a working relationship between the national committee and the legislative and administrative personnel of the Republican administration which will culminate in victory in 1960. He will inspire the Republican workers in the field with his projection of the Republican philosophy that the Federal Government should not invade the areas of local government and that government should live within its income and not overburden the citizenry with confiscatory taxes and the evils of runaway inflation."

Senator ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL, of Kansas: "The job of Republican national chairman is one which ideally requires a man of action, versatility, creative ideas, political wisdom, and wide experience relating both to the governing of the people and to the closest needs and desires of all the people.

"The members of the Republican National Committee are to be complimented for their selection of a man who so thoroughly fills these qualifications.

"Senator MORTON will command strong support for the cause of the Republican Party. Being a member of the Senate and a former Member of the House he will bring to the national committee experience and background which will be most helpful."

Senator FRANK CARLSON of Kansas:

"I am delighted that the Republican National Committee has selected THRUSTON B. MORTON as the national chairman. He will give young, vigorous leadership to the party.

"His experience, particularly in the executive and legislative branches of the Government, qualify him for this service at a time when we have pressing domestic and international problems."

Senator PRESCOTT BUSH, of Connecticut:

"The Republican National Committee has made an excellent choice. THRUSTON MORTON has had a wealth of political and governmental experience which has given him unusual qualifications to serve as national chairman.

"He will be in an excellent position to advise the White House of the views of Republican Members of Congress, and to inform the latter of the President's opinion on issues as they arise. I believe his election will result in increasing unity in the party."

Senator J. GLENN BEALL, of Maryland:

"I have been closely associated with THRUSTON MORTON both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, and I believe I am in a position to judge him as a Republican and as a leader.

"As national chairman he will be forceful and capable in every respect. The national committee has chosen wisely."

Senator BARRY GOLDWATER, of Arizona: "I offer my wholehearted cooperation and that of the senatorial campaign committee to Senator MORTON. I hope that he will insist that the national committee be restored to its rightful position in the party, and that he himself will be admitted to Cabinet meetings so that he can keep abreast of party policy."

Senator NORRIS COTTON, of New Hampshire: "It is rare that you find a man who combines dynamic leadership with restraint and good judgment. Senator THRUSTON MORTON is such a man and the ideal choice for chairman of the Republican National Committee."

Senator CARL T. CURTIS, of Nebraska: "I regard THRUSTON MORTON as a strong and able Senator and believe he has the capability of being a fine national chairman."

Senator CLIFFORD P. CASE, of New Jersey: "The selection of THRUSTON B. MORTON for national chairman is a first-class choice. He is able, energetic, and effective. I think the President and the national committee have made an excellent decision."

Senator THOMAS E. MARTIN, of Iowa: "Senator MORTON is an excellent choice to be our party's national chairman. He is capable, young, and vigorous, and he is in the fortunate position of combining those qualities with a wealth of experience in the field of practical politics. He will do a good job."

Senator KENNETH B. KEATING, of New York: "Senator MORTON will provide the Republican Party with the dynamic, forward-looking leadership that will carry the GOP to victory in 1960. His selection as Republican national chairman will be of tremendous benefit to the party. His invaluable experience in both the legislative and executive branches of the Government, his wide circle of friends in all walks of life, his political acumen and his ability to communicate the true magnitude of the Republican record in the Eisenhower era now become important assets for all Republicans and for the Republican cause."

Senator CASE, of South Dakota: "THRUSTON MORTON is an excellent man for the job. He understands the factors that make for shadings of opinion and has the ability to unite people for basic goals. He will be a worthy successor to Meade Alcorn and Leonard Hall."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss Republican National Committee politics. However, since we have to have a Republican National Committee and a Democratic National Committee, and since those committees must have chairmen, I wish to say that I do not know how the Republican National Committee could possibly select a better equipped, better qualified, or more able or more highly respected citizen than the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON]. I have known him as a Member of the House of Representatives, as an Assistant Secretary of State, and as a U.S. Senator. I may say that he has lived up to the obligations we associate with the title of each office he has held. I have the greatest respect for him; and I commend the Republican National Committee on its selection—even though I cannot commend the Senator from Kentucky on his selection of his party. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in connection with the subject the minority leader and the majority leader have been discussing, let me say that I am glad to see there is so much harmony.

I agree with the harmonious conclusion they have reached because it refers to a man of character, a man of ability, a man who has had considerable experience in the service of his country and in its ranks. He has served in the executive branch and in both Houses of Congress. No one has ever said anything of a derogatory nature about him. In fact, in every position he has held, he has rendered the maximum of service.

So I am very happy that the National Republican Committee has exercised what I regard as superb judgment in selecting its new chairman.

GREETINGS OF CONGRESS TO FORMER PRESIDENT TRUMAN

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, it is a privilege and an honor to send to the desk a Senate concurrent resolution presenting the greetings and warm regards of the Congress to a distinguished former Member of this body, the Honorable Harry S. Truman; and I am glad that the leadership of the Senate—the minority leader, as well as the majority leader—have approved the resolution.

On May 8 of this year, Mr. Truman will celebrate his 75th birthday. By this resolution we, his old friends, along with his new friends in the Congress, may wish him a very happy birthday and many happy returns.

Few men can look back on a life of greater service to the people of his country and the world. Mr. Truman has served America in many roles—as a soldier of war, as a fighter for peace, as a county judge, as a Member of this body, as President of the United States.

And now he continues in the role of elder statesman and adviser.

His life is in the best American tradition. His patriotism and devotion to duty are an inspiration to all.

Perhaps the finest tribute which can be paid to this distinguished American is that, as his life progresses, he continues to grow in stature and in the esteem of his colleagues.

That is the mark of a truly great man.

Many of the present membership of the Senate served with Mr. Truman during his 10 years on Capitol Hill. As they will remember, he spent the first years learning his way; then he became one of the Senate's most influential Members, and performed a great service as chairman of the War Investigation Subcommittee.

This was his way in every position of responsibility. He spent the early years learning, and the later years performing.

We are indeed fortunate that since he left the White House he has been able to impart to the American people some of his great knowledge and experience.

Those of us who know Mr. Truman have always been impressed by his deep knowledge of, and respect for, the history of the United States.

He has always believed that if a man is to make history he must first understand history; and from that principle developed much of his great strength. Few of our Presidents have had greater knowledge and understanding of the role of Congress, the executive branch, and the judiciary in our political system.

Mr. Truman's years of service to his country bespeak his faith in the people, and his devotion to the ideals of democracy.

It is fitting that we here in the Senate, from which he drew so much, and to which he gave so much, should pay tribute to our distinguished former colleague on his 75th birthday, and by this resolution express our deep respect and gratitude for his service to his country.

Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my senior colleague [Mr. HENNINGS], I submit the concurrent resolution, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 20) as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United State hereby extends to the Honorable Harry S. Truman its greetings, felicitations, and warm regards on the 75th anniversary of his birth, May 8, 1959.

SEC. 2. The Congress expresses its admiration and gratitude to President Truman for his many years of distinguished service to the United States and to the world. As a public servant and man of the people in the highest sense, he has gained the respect of all as the "Man of Independence."

SEC. 3. The Congress expresses particular appreciation for his dedication as Senator, Vice President, President, and author and elder statesman, in the battle against the enemies of freedom. His great efforts in the years following World War II helped unite the free world in its resistance to the common aggressor.

SEC. 4. The Congress expresses the hope that Divine Providence may permit Mr. Truman many more productive years of life and service to his country and to the world.

SEC. 5. A copy of this resolution shall be transmitted to that distinguished citizen of Missouri, the Honorable Harry S. Truman.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I appreciate the thoughtful and kindly act of the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON]. I am delighted to associate myself with what he has said about this able, good, and kind man.

President Truman served with distinction in many public offices, from the Congress to the White House. We all knew of him first as a Member of the U.S. Senate, where his fearlessness and vision distinguished his record here. Later he became Vice President, and he served in that post well.

When he assumed the office of President, on the death of President Roosevelt, he served with distinction and courage. I believe that history will record that this country has never had a more honest President, a more courageous and a more fearless President, or one who was more vitally concerned with the problems of all the people of the world.

I am delighted that the Senator from Missouri, with the cooperation of the minority leader, has made it possible for the Senate to express itself, as it will shortly do, through the adoption of the concurrent resolution now under consideration.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the Senator from Texas. I am very sure the subject Mr. Truman will be grateful to the majority leader for his kind and gracious remarks.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in the rather mellow aura of an anniversary occasion, we have an opportunity to look back, look around, and look forward. Such occasions of course are marked by timely remarks tinged with mellowness and sympathy, which are indeed written in the resolution of my colleague from the great neighboring State of Missouri.

I think often of the visit with President Truman after I departed from public service in the House of Representatives. My bags were packed, and I was prepared to go home. I called up one of his assistants. I said, "I would like to see the President and say goodby to him and his family." The President was very busy. I said, "I will wait. If I have to, I will wait a week." So the following day I had an appointment with the President. We spent at least 30 minutes visiting. I recall with what vigor he said to me, "You should not have quit." I said I had an eye malady. I felt I should quit in the interest of my recovery. Mr. Truman said, "We need fellows like you." I said, "I could not leave Washington until I said goodby." In the hurly-burly of political activities, we usually "make tracks" when the session is over, and our bags are packed 2 days beforehand, in our eager desire to get home. It was a beautiful visit.

Later, when I was a candidate for the Senate, Mr. Truman came to visit me in a neighboring city. As an illustration of the kind of man he is, he wanted me to win. That is indicative of politics in this country. Underneath his front, he has a robust and sterling character.

I notice the language of the resolution is "the 'Man of Independence'." Being a stickler in etymology, I thought it should read, "the 'Man from Independence'." But I would not find fault with a preposition, because no one will say that our distinguished former President is not a man of independence in every sense of the word.

He has served the Nation well. I salute him for his service. I salute him also as a friend, for when he is one's friend, he is a friend in truth and in fact.

To mark this anniversary is one of the delightful and one of the worthwhile things we can do, because it adds to the reservoir of good will. So we salute him on his 75th birth anniversary.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the distinguished minority leader for his kind and courteous remarks with respect to the No. 1 citizen of my State. I am sure Mr. Truman will appreciate also the comments the Senator from Illinois has been good enough to make on this occasion. Mr. Truman is a man of independence from Independence. Again my appreciation to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, as an indication of one of the reasons why the junior Senator from Virginia wishes to support the resolution extending congratulations to a distinguished American, he would like to call attention to the fact that the desk occupied by the junior Senator from Virginia is the one formerly occupied by a Senator who later became President, Mr. Harry Truman.

It is a pleasure for me to sit at this desk. It is a source of great gratification to me that a distinguished former Member of the Senate and former President is an outstanding supporter of the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON].

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I thank my able friend from Virginia for his kind remarks. I am sure there is no Senator Mr. Truman would prefer having use his old desk than the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I am glad to yield to the able Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. It is with pleasure that I support the resolution offered by the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri. The former President, former U.S. Senator, former county judge—the great citizen of Missouri, of the United States, and of the world—Harry S. Truman, is entitled to honor, to love, and to respect. His patriotism has never been questioned. It cannot be questioned. His devotion to the public welfare is not subject to question. A man eminent in the life of our country and eminent in the hearts of his fellow countrymen is now honored by the adoption of this resolution, and I am happy to support it.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Tennessee for his superb remarks with respect to the life and public service of Mr. Truman. I am sure Mr. Truman also will be grateful for the comments of the distinguished Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The concurrent resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. HENNINGS subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to take a few moments to speak briefly in honor of Missouri's most famous citizen on the approach of his 75th birthday anniversary. I have the honor to be a member of the national committee which has been designated to plan the celebration of the event.

All of us know that many things have been said and are still being said about Harry S. Truman by persons of varied political persuasion. It is only natural that he has been both praised and criticized, for he, himself, has never been sparing in his praise or criticism.

However, I believe that there is one thing about Mr. Truman upon which all can agree, one thing which both his friends and those who criticize him will grant him, and that is a personal courage second to no man. It is a personal courage which absolutely refuses to allow him to back away from a fight regardless of the forces alined against him.

All of us should remember this man's courage when he was a U.S. Senator. Let us all remember his courage as President of the United States. We recall that Harry Truman became President at a time when the Nation stood in need of courage. Let all of us remember that Harry Truman's courage was, throughout his years as President, repeatedly weighed and not found wanting.

When it comes to courage, and when it comes to assaying and weighing courage in the balance, I suggest that Harry Truman was and is the epitome of the highest ideals of courage which have characterized men throughout the formation and the life of the American Republic.

Only history and future generations can be the judge, but it is my belief that Harry Truman, acting almost alone, saved the free world in 1950. We recall that year as the year in which he told the Communist world that it could no longer pursue a course of world domination by act of armed aggression. On June 25, 1950, we went into Korea. Unhappily we are still not free from the threat of Russian militarism and all that communism represents. However, Harry Truman showed us the way. I am sure that future historians will rank him as one of this Nation's really great Presidents, and I am sure also that future historians will also rank his as one of this Nation's really great men.

Along with the other Senators who join me in sponsoring the resolution which was submitted this morning by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] and agreed to, I wish Harry Truman a happy 75th birthday anniversary and hope that he will have many, many more happy birthday anniversaries. I believe that the Nation also wishes Harry Truman many, many more birthday anniversaries, and I believe that that wish is entertained irrespective of party or political affiliation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is in order.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 13

"Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to take steps to acquire, establish, and develop a Kettle Moraine National Park in Wisconsin to properly commemorate the Glacial Age

"Whereas one of the most important chapters in the geographical and geological history of our country, much more important than the features which most of our present national parks are dedicated to preserve or commemorate, is the Glacial Age—a period when glaciers repeatedly invaded the North Central and Northeastern parts of the United States and gorgeously carved and remodeled the entire surface of this area into a huge panorama of one of nature's rarest wonderworks; and

"Whereas because the Kettle Moraine State Park in Wisconsin is the only memorial established in recognition of these historical facts of national moment that indelibly molded the geographical character of this great expanse; because categorically the Kettle Moraine area is by far the most attractive and representative in which to establish a national park to commemorate the Glacial Age and its impact on this territory and the lives and habits of its people; because at present costs and rate of progress it will take the State of Wisconsin another 50 years to complete acquisition and development of the Kettle Moraine State Park as proposed in a 1936 State survey; because this land must be purchased and developed soon—before the inevitable population explosion, which is destined to follow the opening of the St. Lawrence Waterways, strikes Wisconsin and sends costs skyrocketing to prohibitive heights; because it is important that not only Wisconsin but this entire North Central and Northeastern area be provided with a Kettle Moraine National Park to give outdoor recreational opportunities for its rapidly increasing population; the State of Wisconsin seeks the aid of the Federal Government in developing a Kettle Moraine National Park and promises active cooperation toward bringing to reality in the Kettle Moraine area a national park concept to properly commemorate the Glacial Age; and

"Whereas the Republican Party in Wisconsin expressed the desire of thousands of people in Wisconsin and in its entire glacial area, when at its Platform Convention in 1958, it adopted the following resolution:

" 'We recognize the desirability of preserving the Kettle Moraine area of Wisconsin as a national park and pledge immediate cooperation with the Federal authorities in preserving the maximum area of this desirable region'; and

"Whereas the Democratic Party State platform adopted in 1958 said in part '* * * the Democratic Party favors:

" '4. Adoption of the basic plan of the proposed Moraine National Park for Wisconsin': Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate, the assembly concurring, That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin memorializes the Congress of the United States to take necessary steps to acquire, establish and develop a Kettle Moraine National Park in Wisconsin to properly commemorate the Glacial Age, and pledges cooperation toward bringing to reality, in the Kettle Moraine area in Wisconsin, such national park concept; and, be it further

"Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, to each House of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS OF CONNECTICUT LEGISLATURE

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my colleague, the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], I present resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut memorializing Congress to support a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution relative to the imposition and collections of taxes on income by the States, and to amend Public Law 85–316. I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD and be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the joint resolutions were received, appropriately referred, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Finance:

"HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 69

"Joint resolution memorializing Congress to support a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution relative to the imposition and collections of taxes on income by the States

"Resolved by this assembly:

"Whereas citizens of Connecticut residing within this State, but employed in the State of New York and Massachusetts, are imposed upon by being forced to pay income taxes to those States; and

"Whereas citizens of Connecticut residing within this State, but employed outside of Connecticut are bearing a considerable share of the tax burden imposed upon all the residents of this State by the various Connecticut State tax laws, especially the sales tax; and

"Whereas the citizens of Connecticut residing within this State, but employed outside of Connecticut find the income taxes imposed upon them by New York and Massachusetts to be a most difficult burden in these times of inflationary costs, especially since these taxes are in addition to the various Connecticut State taxes already being borne by them; and

"Whereas U.S. Senators STYLES BRIDGES and NORRIS COTTON, of New Hampshire, have proposed an amendment to the Federal Constitution to bring to an end the imposition of income taxes by one State upon the residents of other States: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by this assembly, That the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut hereby memorializes the Congress of the United States to support a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution by adopting Senate Joint Resolution 29 introduced by said STYLES BRIDGES and NORRIS COTTON, providing that the several States would have no power to impose and collect taxes on income from whatever source derived except in respect to residents of the State imposing the tax; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State and from New Hampshire and from New Jersey.

"Adopted in house of representatives March 9, 1959.

"Adopted in senate March 24, 1959."

To the Committee on the Judiciary:

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 26

"Joint resolution memorializing Congress to amend Public Law 85–316

"Resolved by this assembly:

"Whereas there are many Americans who have filed petitions with the immigration authorities of the United States for the entry of their sons, daughters, brothers, and sisters, which petitions are classified in the fourth preference quota of the Immigration and Nationality Act; and

"Whereas of the four preference quotas established by the Federal Immigration and Nationality Act, the first, second, and third quotas are allotted 100 percent of the total annual entry quota; and

"Whereas, as a result, those persons who fall within the fourth preference section must depend for entry into this country upon deficiencies in the first three quotas; and

"Whereas there is frustration and despair resulting from the law that gives hope to Americans by permitting them to file petitions, getting them approved, and then compelling them to wait for their kin who may never come; and

"Whereas thousands of discontented people abroad, whose hopes are first raised and then dashed, certainly cannot believe in the good will we try to engender through our foreign policy, and thus become easy prey to the propaganda of unfriendly nations; and

"Whereas Congress has recognized and alleviated a similar problem through Public Law 85–316, which includes a provision for reuniting spouses and minor children of aliens legally residing in this country whose petitions were approved prior to July 1, 1957: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut memorialize Congress to amend the provisions of Public Law 85–316 to include cases which fall within the fourth preference quota, in order to provide for entry of the many thousands, petitions for whom have piled up in a backlog in prior years; that, in order not to create another problem of separated families, those applicants who are married and have families be permitted to bring them; and that a suitable copy of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to each Congressman and Senator from the State of Connecticut.

"Adopted in senate March 19, 1959.

"Adopted in house of representatives March 26, 1959."

"Whereas in the State of New Mexico there are many communities located in mountainous country, far removed from stations which transmit television signals; and

"Whereas the effect of the regulation of the Federal Communications Commission is to deprive many communities in New Mexico of the means of receiving television: Now, therefore, be it

Seaton, Secretary of the U.S. Department of the Interior, urge upon the Bureau of the Budget and the U.S. Congress the inclusion in the Bureau of Reclamation Colorado River budget of $500,000 for the fiscal year 1960, which sum and appropriation be dedicated to the start of the Hammond project; and be it further

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE MEMORIAL 18

Whereas the New Mexico Boy's Ranch has been established to provide an opportunity for the youth of this State to become better citizens; and

LOW PRICE OF EGGS—LETTER

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, once more I desire to call attention to the fact that I have in my hand another letter dealing with the low price of eggs in North Dakota—18 cents a dozen. With a 50-cent dollar, it means the farmers are getting 9 cents a dozen for eggs. Time and time again I have called attention to this situation.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the appropriate committee. The committee can take up the matter to the Department of Agriculture. I earnestly hope that something will be done in order that farmers of the Midwest may receive a fair price for eggs.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAVALIER, N. DAK., April 7, 1959.

Senator WILLIAM LANGER,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. LANGER: I am sending you the markets from our Pembina County paper so you can see what us farmers up here are getting for our produce. Do you think a farmer can feed hens for eggs at 18 cents for grade A? And look at the price we get if we sell them, 7 cents. I wish you would show this to Ezra T. Benson and President Eisenhower also if they think the farmers are getting rich. We only have a 160-acre farm and how can we make a living? Don't we deserve better treatment?

We hope you are feeling good also your wife. Thanks for what you have done for us in the past.

Sincerely yours,

CHESTER CROSBY.

AMENDMENT OF TITLE 18, UNITED STATES CODE, RELATING TO ASSAULTS AND HOMICIDES IN REGARD TO CERTAIN FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to make it a Federal offense to kill, assault, resist, oppose, impede, intimidate, or interfere with any U.S. commissioner, or certain officers and employees of the Departments of Labor, Commerce, Health, Education, and Welfare, and of the Post Office and the General Services Administration, as well as Federal probation officers while in performance of his official duties. Except in the case of U.S. commissioners, the only employees covered would be those concerned with investigatory or enforcement functions.

This bill has been enthusiastically endorsed by the administration as to the executive departments concerned; and I may add that since U.S. commissioners sit as trial magistrates, it is patently clear that they should be afforded the same protection as other Federal judicial officers.

Under the present laws, such protection applies only to Federal judges, U.S. attorneys, officers and employees of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and a few other Federal workers.

Experience has shown that the knowledge that Federal laws apply to, and Federal enforcement agents investigate, attacks on certain Federal employees goes a long way toward deterring such actions. Even though the crimes are crimes under State laws, the deterring power of Federal protection is immeasurable.

We owe this protection to all Government employees who face the probability of assault or intimidation in carrying out their duties.

The bill I introduce would close a loophole in the present laws, by providing the shield of Federal laws for employees in these departments who constantly face danger.

Certainly those who risk life and limb for the good of the Nation deserve all the protection we can afford them. There should be no controversy about this measure, and I trust it will be given early and favorable consideration by Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be made a part of the RECORD; and I also ask that the bill be allowed to remain on the table until Thursday, April 16, 1959, so that other Senators may have an opportunity to join in sponsoring it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD, and lie on the desk as requested by the Senator from New York.

The bill (S. 1661) to include U.S. commissioners and certain officers and employees of the Department of Labor, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Post Office Department, the General Services Administration, and Federal probation officers within the provisions of sections 1111 and 1114 of title 18 of the United States Code relating to assaults and homicides, introduced by Mr. KEATING, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1114 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1114. Protection of officers and employees of the United States.

"Whoever kills any judge of the United States, any United States commissioner, any United States attorney, any assistant United States attorney, or any United States marshal or deputy marshal or person employed to assist such marshal or deputy marshal, any officer or employee of the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, any post office inspector, any postmaster, officer, or employee in the field service of the Post Office Department, any officer or employee of the Secret Service or of the Bureau of Narcotics, any officer or enlisted man of the Coast Guard, any officer or employee of any United States penal or correctional institution, any probation officer of a United States district court, any officer, employee or agent of the Customs or of the Internal Revenue or any person assisting him in the execution of his duties, any immigration officer, any officer or employee of the Department of Agriculture or of the Department of the Interior designated by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Interior to enforce any Act of Congress for the protection, preservation, or restoration of game and other wild birds and animals, any officer or employee of the National Park Service, any officer or employee of, or assigned to duty in, the field service of the Bureau of Land Management, any employee of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture, any officer or employee of the Indian field service of the United States, any officer or employee of the Department of Labor authorized to perform duties in connection with investigatory or enforcement functions under provisions relating to labor in any law of the United States, any officer, guard, or special policeman who is designated either by the Secretary of Commerce or by any person authorized by him to make such designation, or who is designated by the Administrator of the General Services Administration or by any person authorized by him to make such designation, to guard and protect property of the United States under the administration and control of the Department of Commerce or the General Services Administration, or any officer or employee of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in a position designated by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare as involving functions in connection with the enforcement (including any investigatory or inspection activities in connection with the enforcement) of the food and drug or public health laws administered by such Department, while engaged in the performance of his official duties, or on account of the performance of his official duties, shall be punished as provided under sections 1111 and 1112 of this title."

ARKANSAS POST NATIONAL PARK, ARK.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide for the establishment of the Arkansas Post National Park in the State of Arkansas.

The National Park Service has completed an extensive series of historical and archeological investigations in the Arkansas Post area. These investigations reaffirm the significance of Arkansas Post. I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the investigations be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit I.)

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the Interior Department's Advisory Board on National Parks and Historical Sites, after studying the results of the investigations, approved Arkansas Post for consideration as a national park. I am gratified that the Board has taken this favorable action, and I hope that the Senate will take action on the bill in the near future.

I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial on this subject from the Arkansas Gazette dated March 30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1662) to provide for the establishment of the Arkansas Post National Park in the State of Arkansas, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

[From the Arkansas Gazette, Mar. 30, 1959]

ARKANSAS POST

The Interior Department's Advisory Board on National Parks and Historic Sites has approved Arkansas Post for consideration as a national park with the encouraging observation that the area is "of exceptional value for commemorating the important historical events associated with exploration and settlement of the lower Mississippi Valley."

Arkansas Post is entitled to the description. As one of the earliest white settlements on the west bank of the Mississippi, it served as a staging point for the exploration of the frontier, and many of the historic adventurers of that day are thought or are known to have visited its vicinity.

Among these explorers were Hernando de Soto, who is believed to have stopped near there in 1541. Others included Father Jacques Marquette and Louis Joliet in 1673; the Sieur de la Salle, who in 1682 took formal possession of the entire Louisiana territory in the name of Louis XIV; and Henri di Tonty, who established the first settlement at the post a few years later.

Arkansas Post is historically important, not merely to a single section of the South, but to the whole Nation. It deserves the status of a national monument.

EXHIBIT I

ARKANSAS POST PROJECT, ARKANSAS

I. SUMMARY HISTORY OF THE AREA

The chief significance of Arkansas Post is that it was the first white settlement of a semipermanent character in the lower Mississippi Valley and the later Louisiana Purchase. It was established by Henri di Tonty, a lieutenant of the famed explorer, Robert Cavalier de la Salle, in 1686 as a fur trading post.

Tonty himself wrote in 1693 that his post on the Arkansas was merely "a house surrounded by stakes." A visitor to the place in 1687, a year after it was built, described it as a "house * * * built of pieces of cedar laid one upon another and rounded away at the corners; its roof is of bark." This first Arkansas Post served as a trading house for the Indians, strengthened the French alliance with the friendly Quapaw Indians, and was designed as an intermediate post between the Illinois and the French settlements at the mouth of the Mississippi. Lack of references to Tonty's Arkansas establishments by contemporary travelers leads us to believe that it was abandoned about 1700 and another post was not erected on the Arkansas until two decades later.

It was not until 1721 that the French, under the Scotch promoter, John Law, established another post on the Arkansas, presumably at another location some distance away. The exact location is not known. With the exception of only a few years thereafter, both the French and Spanish maintained a garrison on the Arkansas until Louisiana was transferred to the United States in 1804. Although moved several times to different locations, Arkansas Post had a continuous existence from the 1720's until recent times.

Arkansas Post was overshadowed in importance by such places as New Orleans, Natchitoches, and St. Louis. During its heyday under the French and Spanish, not more than a company of troops was there at any time, and the population under the two regimes never exceeded 200 people. However, it was considered by the colonial administrations of both France and Spain to be of such importance that from the early 1730's a garrison was always maintained on the Arkansas. The role of Arkansas Post under the French and Spanish may be summarized as follows:

(1) It was one of the leading centers for Indian trade on the Mississippi River and of the Arkansas which drained a large area to the west.

(2) The post served as an intermediate point and as a stopping place for convoys traveling between New Orleans and the Illinois country.

(3) The garrison served to strengthen the alliance between France and later Spain, and their strongest Indian ally in Louisiana, the Quapaw.

(4) The post served as a base for French expansion into New Mexico.

(5) The garrison served as an important frontier outpost against the hostile Osage and other unfriendly Indian tribes on the western border of Louisiana.

After a time following the transfer of Arkansas Post to the United States in 1804, the area continued to be an important center for Indian trade. It reached its greatest importance from 1819 to 1821 when it was the capital of Arkansas Territory. The site of this last Arkansas Post is preserved as Arkansas Post State Park. During the Civil War the Confederacy recognized its strategic location on the Arkansas River by fortifying it and placing 3,000 troops there. In 1863, 30,000 Federal troops under Gen. John C. McClelland captured the post and kept control of the area during the remainder of the war.

II. NATIONAL PARK SERVICE STUDIES OF THE ARKANSAS POST AREA

Arkansas Post has been the subject of intermittent study by the National Park Service since February 1935.

The Advisory Board of the National Park Service in 1940 voted that "as one of the earliest sites in the lower Mississippi Valley and as an area of transition between the regimes of the Indians, the Frenchman, the Spaniards, and the American, Arkansas Post should be classified as an eligible site within the scope of the Historic Sites Act." However, this conclusion was based on the assump that archeological excavations would yield data regarding the successive sites of Arkansas Post and that consequently, these aspects of the lower Mississippi Valley history might be successfully interpreted.

During the years 1956 through 1958 the National Park Service conducted and sponsored research aimed at locating the site of the original Arkansas Post of 1686. This research included a comprehensive documentary study and two separate archeological projects. The results of these studies, which were made possible by special congressional appropriations, are given below.

Historical research

The historical investigations were undertaken by Ray H. Mattison, National Park Service historian, in 1956 and 1957. Utilizing all available sources, he compiled a history of Arkansas Post, with particular emphasis on any information on location which could be found. He was able to establish that Arkansas Post had been moved a number of times. Concerning the available information, Mattison says:

"The available documentary data have been carefully searched for every clue as to the possible locations of Arkansas Post. Unfortunately the references found were generally fragmentary and extremely obscure. The map sections of a number of the leading libraries of the Nation were carefully combed for maps of the lower Arkansas * * * these proved to be very contradictory in many instances."

Archeological research

Two separate archeological projects investigated pertinent areas in an attempt to locate physical remains of Tonty's Arkansas Post of 1686. The first of these in the fall of 1956 and the spring of 1957 was under the direction of Dr. Preston Holder, then of Washington University, St. Louis. The second, in 1958, was under the direction of Dr. James A. Ford, of the American Museum of National History.

Holder concentrated his work at and adjacent to Arkansas Post State Park. He found the occupation area extended considerably beyond the bounds of the present park lands. He found no evidence which could be attributed to the post of 1686. He did find evidence of a French and Spanish population living on the site for a considerable time during the 18th century, probably beginning as early as 1750. He found a complex of trenches indicating several relatively large structures, although erosion had claimed whole sections of the buildings. He concluded, "There is every likelihood that there are some remains of a fort built in this vicinity in the early 1750's by the French Commander de la Houssaye. There is an equal or greater likelihood that there are remains of the Spanish fort of San Carlos III of the early 1780's."

Ford's work was at the site of the Menard Mounds, about 15 miles away as the crow flies. He found no physical evidence of the 1686 post, but he did find a small amount of trade goods with some burials, and believes on the basis of this and physiographic evidence that the Menard site was the Quapaw village of Osotouay where Tonty's post was erected in 1686. He succeeded in defining the cultural complex of the Quapaw Indians at the time of European contact, but found no evidence of actual European structural remains.

The archeological projects, therefore, failed to locate the exact site of the French post of 1686, but did locate French and Spanish settlements of the last half of the 18th century at and near the Arkansas Post State Park.

FLEXIBLE RATE OF INTEREST FOR GOVERNMENT FINANCING UNDER MERCHANT MARINE ACT

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide a flexible rate of interest for Government financing under the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Under Secretary of Commerce, requesting the proposed legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1671) to provide a flexible rate of interest for Government financing under the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The letter presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, D.C., April 9, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD M. NIXON,
President of the Senate,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There are attached four copies of draft legislation "To provide a flexible rate of interest for Government financing under the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, and for other purposes," together with a statement of purpose and provisions of the proposed legislation.

The Department believes that this draft bill would provide an adequate basis for meeting all costs of the Federal Ship Mortgage Loan program including interest, administrative expenses and a reserve for possible loss.

We are advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the presentation of this draft legislation to the Congress for its consideration and that its enactment would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

FREDERICK H. MUELLER,
Under Secretary of Commerce.

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE AND PROVISIONS OF DRAFT BILL TO PROVIDE A FLEXIBLE RATE OF INTEREST FOR GOVERNMENT FINANCING UNDER THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT, 1936, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

The purpose of the draft bill is to amend the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, to provide a flexible rate of interest, to be charged by the United States upon the unpaid balance of the purchase price of vessels it sells under that act, which will be sufficient to cover its cost of borrowing money, its administrative expenses connected with the credit transaction, and a reserve for probable losses.

Under existing law, the rate required to be charged upon such unpaid balances is 3½ percent per annum which is not at present sufficient to cover the foregoing costs.

The draft bill would add a new section 512 to the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, which would provide that when vessels are sold under that act, on credit, the interest that shall be charged on the unpaid balance of the purchase price shall be a composite rate consisting of two components.

The first component would be a rate equal to the current average market yield, during the month preceding the execution of the contract to sell the vessel, as determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of maturities comparable to the vessel mortgage maturity. This would cover the cost to the United States of borrowing money. During the month of November 1958, this rate, as determined by the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with other lending transactions of the United States, was 3¾ percent per annum.

The second component would be a rate, determined by the Secretary of Commerce to be sufficient to cover administrative expenses and probable losses, which shall be not less than one-half of 1 percent per annum and not more than 1 percent per annum, except that during the period during which the vessel to be sold is under construction the charge to cover administrative expenses and probable losses shall be not less than one-quarter of 1 percent and not more than one-half of 1 percent.

The foregoing minimum and maximum rates to cover administrative expenses connected with the credit transaction, and a reserve for probable losses, are the same as the minimum and maximum premium rates which are authorized under title XI of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, for mortgage insurance under that title. These rates provide sufficient flexibility, in the opinion of the Department of Commerce, so that, for the foreseeable future, the draft bill will authorize a rate which will cover administrative costs and a reserve for probable losses.

The composite interest rate which the draft bill would require be charged on the unpaid balance of the purchase price of vessels sold under the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, during December 1958 (if the draft bill had then been law), would be (except for the period during which the vessel is under construction) a minimum of 4¼ percent per annum and a maximum of 4¾ percent per annum. These minimum and maximum rates consist of (A) 3¾ percent per annum which during November 1958 (the month preceding the month during which the hypothetical contract of sale was entered into), was the current average yield of marketable obligations of the United States with maturities comparable to 20 years, plus (B) a minimum of one-half of 1 percent and a maximum of 1 percent to cover administrative expenses and a reserve for probable losses.

In addition to changing the interest rate on the unpaid balances of vessels sold under the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, the draft bill would change the minimum charter rate on vessels chartered under the Merchant Marine Act, 1936. Section 714 of that act now provides that the minimum charter rate on such vessels shall be 5 percent per annum of the foreign cost of the vessel plus 3½ percent of the depreciated foreign cost of the vessel computed annually upon the basis of a 20-year life of the vessel. This minimum charter rate is intended to recover a 5 percent per annum depreciation charge plus 3½ percent per annum interest. Since 3½ percent per annum does not cover the Government's cost, the draft bill would substitute for the 3½ percent rate the flexible rate which it provides upon the sale of a vessel.

The draft bill would amend all of the sales provisions of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, to incorporate the interest provisions provided by the new section 512.

If vessels are built under title VII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, by the United States because the purposes of that act could not be carried out under title V, the draft bill would require that if such vessels are sold on credit, the interest charged upon the unpaid balance of the purchase price be at the rate provided in the draft bill, rather than at the rate of 3½ percent which is required by existing law.

The flexible interest rate would also apply to the sale of vessels acquired under title XI of the 1936 act through an assignment to the Secretary of Commerce of a vessel mortgage which he has insured under which there has been a default giving rise to a right to foreclose.

The draft bill would also amend Public Law 85–521 which authorizes the construction of two superliners, one to be operated in the Atlantic and one in the Pacific, and the sale of the vessels at prices fixed in that act with the terms of payment provided in section 502(c) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936. These terms of payment under existing law include interest at the rate of 3½ percent per annum. The draft bill would change this interest rate to the flexible rate it provides for the sale of other vessels. This rate, if the contract to sell the vessels had been executed in December 1958, would be a minimum of 4¼ percent and a maximum of 4¾ percent.

CONSTRUCTION OF ADDITIONAL MUSEUM BY ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution which would provide for the construction of a museum at the Savannah River plant in South Carolina. This would be similar to the museum which was very successfully established at Oak Ridge, Tenn., some years ago. It would house nuclear exhibits for the general public to see. I feel this would be valuable in bringing to the attention of the American people the great potential of nuclear energy for peacetime use.

The U.S. Government is spending millions and millions of dollars in the development of nuclear energy, and it is certainly the intention of the United States to use this energy in a peaceful manner. Since the taxpayers are bearing the costs, I think it only proper that we keep them informed of the great progress which we are making.

I feel that the expenditures necessary for such an exhibition would be very small, indeed, compared to the great service it would render to the people. All Americans are naturally much interested in the uses of atomic energy, and I hope the Congress will see fit to pass this joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 90) to provide for the construction of an additional museum of atomic energy by the Atomic Energy Commission for the housing of exhibits and the dissemination of information concerning atomic energy and its peacetime uses, introduced by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

On request of Mr. KENNEDY, and by unanimous consent, the name of Mr. CARROLL was added as an additional cosponsor of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and other Senators) on March 25, 1959.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION, RELATING TO EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF JOINT RESOLUTION

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN], be added as an additional cosponsor of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 69) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the equal rights for men and women, introduced by me on March 9, 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION RELATING TO ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF JOINT RESOLUTION

Under authority of the order of the Senate of March 26, 1959, the names of Senators MURRAY, RANDOLPH, MCCLELLAN, FULBRIGHT, ERVIN, STENNIS, and HENNINGS were added as additional cosponsors of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 86) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and Mr. HILL) on March 26, 1959.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

By Mr. MAGNUSON:

Address entitled "Moscow's Cold War Air Force," delivered by Senator BARTLETT at the American Legion Queens County meeting, New York City, on March 20, 1959.

REALISTIC PLANNING NEEDED TO BENEFIT FROM ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared under the title "Realistic Planning Needed to Benefit from St. Lawrence Seaway."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

As we know, the St. Lawrence Seaway, scheduled to open this month, will bring new economic life not only to the Great Lakes and upper Midwestern region, but to the Nation.

According to current estimates, the first ships of the 1959 shipping season will begin probably the week of the 20th to come through the improved and deepened waterway.

The event will mark a milestone of progress in the tremendous construction and engineering feat, providing trade and commerce on the Great Lakes—America's fourth seacoast—with a deep sea route to the ports of the world. In effect, the completion of the Seaway will transform a dream into a reality.

Around the Great Lakes, communities in Wisconsin and other States are making tremendous efforts to improve port and harbor facilities to get maximum benefit from the Seaway.

We recognize, of course, that constructive, realistic planning is essential for the future. Among other things, the challenges include: Further expansion and development of port and harbor facilities; development of waterfront sites; dovetailing of rail and road transportation facilities for "local" and "through" traffic with water terminals; and other actions to take advantage of new opportunities.

A recent publication by the Great Lakes Commission on Great Lakes Port Organization and Administration, carried a thought-provoking article entitled "The Seaway: A New Dimension for the Great Lakes Region and Mid-Continent Area." The ideas contained in this article reflect upon the problems and challenges involved in full utilization of this artery into the heartland of America, as well as some of the policy decisions that remain at the national and international level. The article is as follows:

"THE SEAWAY: A NEW DIMENSION FOR THE GREAT LAKES REGION AND MID-CONTINENT AREA

"(By John L. Hazard, professor of business and transportation, Michigan State University)

"The role of the lake ports

"The Seaway comes to the midcontinent as the agent of change—far-reaching, long-term, deep-seated, and fundamental change. It has been over 7 years since Canada made a final commitment to proceed, alone if necessary, with the construction of the Seaway at the St. Lawrence. During this interval of seaway assurance and presumed midcontinent preparations, the Seaway has constituted at the same time an opportunity, a challenge, a threat, and an enigma to the different elements of the midcontinent. It has been the role of the lake ports, during this period of varying expectations, to penetrate the fog that shrouds the seaway, to analyze its implications and to set the midcontinent on the road to constructive and realistic preparations.

"This is, indeed, a large order of responsibility and a formidable task that has lent itself to varying interpretations. As an opportunity, the Seaway is probably the most significant industrial location and economic development influence in the history of the lake ports since the Erie Canal and the westward extension of the railroads. Beyond the industrial implications, the Seaway provides the ports with an opportunity to become the focal point from which the midcontinent might emerge to conduct much of its merchandise foreign trade in its own right. As a challenge, the Seaway has posed the fundamental problem of instantaneous transformation from primarily localized industrial ports to cosmopolitan port complexes responsible to approximately one-half of the North American population and industry.

"The Seaway has been conceived by many enterprises and cities, some of them now its foremost potential beneficiaries, as a threat, a change in the status quo, a specter of competition and poverty. Primarily, however, the Seaway has been an enigma to the lake port communities and as such has provoked a spectrum of very different community responses.

"I shall direct my remarks in this session to providing a setting for the more pointed talks to follow. In the limited time available I will attempt to cover, very quickly, the elements of the Seaway, the opportunities it holds latent, the issues and problems before the lake ports and some of the policy decisions that remain at the Federal and international level. In the process I shall try to obstain from either prejudging or evaluating the issues until they have been thoroughly discussed by the highly competent panel of experts who have been assembled for that purpose. In the final evaluation sessions I shall be willing to carry the argument that involved in the Seaway is the basic and larger question of the international emergence of an economically and politically unified midcontinent. Secondly, unless evidence to the contrary emerges from these sessions, I will pose the case that the U.S. midcontinent is almost totally unprepared for the advent of the Seaway—neither the larger opportunities that it holds nor to answer the magnitude of issues that it raises.

"Elements of the Seaway

"The Seaway is a waterway effecting a union between the North American midcontinent and most assuredly over a third of the world's population. Its agents are ocean and lake vessels. In the limited time available, we can probably get the best view of the spectrum of opportunity inherent in the Seaway by discussing these elements in rather barebone simplicity. The Seaway itself is a waterway with limitations. It is not a St. Lawrence Seaway but rather a Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway. It will be a single-lock canal at the St. Lawrence within 5 months, must reach up through each of the connecting channels (estimated to be at various stages from late 1960 to early 1963) and must then probe deep into the recesses of each of the deserving lake ports (to be accorded a schedule of dredging priorities). Even then, the Seaway will not be a completed fact.

"The Seaway must set in motion changes that produce its traffic and, in poetic justice, must respond to the magnitude of those changes. It must, then, become a continuum—progressively setting off change and responding to its magnitude—or be consigned to functional obsolescence by virtue of rapidly changing vessel technology or innovations in competitive paralleling transportation. The Seaway strikes into a dynamic and competitive universe whose test of success and survival is change and growth.

"The Seaway is by no means an ideal waterway, though its limitations have been vastly exaggerated by those who either magnify the transitional adjustments necessary for its utilization or take an entirely static view of the ingenuity of the shipping world or the North American capacity for industrial innovation. The only fundamental limitations of the trade route are to be found in its seasonality, limitations of dimensions, and directional orientation. The Seaway seasonality is a function of its icing over for about 4 months out of the year, and even this would be difficult to hold as a constant in view of the high nonproductive overhead costs and the increasing availability of chemical, heat and energy, air bubbling, and mechanical techniques for dissolving and breaking ice.

"The dimensional limitations of the Seaway are well known; the locks, for instance, have 200 feet less length, 20 feet less width, and 10 feet less depth than those that are already proving to be obsolete at the Panama Canal. Even though locks are considered to be permanent fixtures, they do not fix the project with permanent limitations. At the time of project duplication—which in my own opinion will have to be much sooner than ever anticipated—the locks must be gaged to the future dimensional and technological requirements of shipping. The directional limitation of the Seaway is to be found in the fact that it constitutes a long, narrow funnel throwing high out into the North Atlantic, a point from which omnidirectional sailing, particularly to southern and eastern hemispheres, involves circuitous distances. This will not become a very serious problem unless the whole direction of our trade shifts dramatically.

"One cannot foresee such a trend even with the advent of Euromart and the European free-trade community. The dominant direction of our trade is with countries economically accessible by the Seaway; for instance, nations conducting over 74 percent of the U.S. foreign trade by volume have already been reached by the miniature, short-range vessels plying the old St. Lawrence Canal.

"The ocean vessel is the Seaway's agent of change. We have long heard that the Seaway will introduce ocean vessels of 9,000 deadweight tons into the Great Lakes and draw lakers of up to 25,000 deadweight tons out to the ocean. This has given little credit to the ingenuity and adaptability of the maritime industries. It now appears more probable that hybrids combining the seaworthiness of ocean vessels and some of the capacity features of lakers will be the prototypes designed specifically for Seaway carriage. These already have been constructed up to 15,500 tons and are under design up to 19,000 tons. Basically, the multiple bulk hybrids are not severely circumscribed by Seaway dimensions, for they can carry in a single hold the total freight accommodated in 13 to 15 average freight trains. These hybrids—many constructed, operated, and manned under foreign flags—experience line-haul costs of about 1 mill per ton-mile, which is approximately one-sixth or one-seventh the railroad ton-mile costs in the specialized bulk movements (60- to 85-ton gondola and hopper cars). It is within their capabilities to haul from Chicago to Liverpool at less cost than railroads experience between Chicago and New York City. These bulk vessels are reinforced by the more dexterous general cargo vessels of from 8,000 to 9,500 tons capacity. These experience line-haul costs as low as 2 mills per ton-mile, which is about 5.5 to 10 percent of truck line-haul costs and only 20 to 25 percent of railroad line-haul costs.

"Fundamentally, these vessels have cost capabilities of reaching from Chicago to Western Europe as economically as trucks reach from Chicago to Detroit. Further, we find the cycle of innovation in transportation, which started with ships and shifted from trains, to trucks, to air, is now returning to vessel technology in the form of atomic power, new hull structures, different ways of compartmentalizing vessels, containers, roll-on, roll-off, and other means of mechanized cargo handling. In the face of this revolution in ship technology, the introduction of ocean vessels on the Great Lakes perhaps opens a wider spectrum for interlake commercial opportunities than does the Seaway in overseas general cargo trades. One carrier cost study affords evidence that the sea-train-type carrier could compete with railroads on a cost basis—a basis that frequently has little to do with rates—even between such short distance points as Chicago and Milwaukee.

"Furthermore, a cost advantage to the vessel of over 1 cent per ton-mile would apply for each unit of distance beyond those points. Since the Great Lakes are water surrounded by land—rather than land surrounded by water as is the case of continents—the distances between many of the lake ports is shorter by water than it is by overland carriage. The lakes, then, with their large and economically interrelated cities afford an ideal waterway for the integration of carriers through the utilization of common containers and units of carriage.

"The Seaway strikes into the North American midcontinent. Here is a region grown from an elementary agrarian economy to the largest, heavy industry agglomeration in the world in basically the 65 years of Seaway controversy. Its industrial ascension has been at the cost of virtual extinction of most of the resources upon which its industry is founded. This is true of the Pennsylvania and Illinois petroleum, the immense softwood forestry resources which once blanketed the Upper Lakes States, the copper of Upper Peninsula Michigan, the galena deposits of lead and zinc on the Wisconsin-Illinois border and is now becoming abundantly evident in the seemingly inexhaustible supply of iron ore at the head of the lakes. The industrial midcontinent has rapidly pursued a course which makes it the center of the materials void in the United States. Yet, remarkably enough, we have found this region to be politically disunified during the 65 years of Seaway battle; apathetic during its construction; and, in many instances, unprepared for its advent and ex post facto on many of the international policy issues it raises.

"The Seaway unites this region with at least one-third of the world's population and a larger proportion of its economy. Though Seaway romantics have focused most attention on the remote overseas areas, it is probably nearby and undeveloped eastern Canada that holds the major potential for Seaway movement. The Seaway, in this perspective, imposes an additional 2,000 miles of coastline to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system. Eastern Canada is the repository of what may prove to be the world's largest iron ore deposits. The one large company (Iron Ore Co. of Canada) which was working a central deposit at Schefferville in 1954, has been virtually surrounded by 17 companies which have outlined an almost continuous 2,000-mile arc of iron ore stretching from Lake Mistassini up around the Ungava Trough.

"The Seaway has lent a new urgency to resource developments in Canada, and the discoveries have almost perfectly balanced the acute deficiencies of the midcontinent. Large deposits of base metals—copper, zinc, and some lead—have been discovered in New Brunswick and central Quebec, and a large deposit of manganese in New Brunswick. Thorium, rare earths, and titanium oxides are found in abundance along the north shore of the St. Lawrence. The pyrites of New Brunswick offer a large potential for sulphuric acid and a chemical industry in eastern Canada. Asbestos along the south shore of the St. Lawrence and in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia has responded rapidly to the prospect of the Seaway. Nova Scotia gypsum, the largest supply in the world, has seen a number of new entries with prospect of midcontinent support. Moreover, the Seaway opens the midcontinent to prospective materials support from virtually all countries abutting on the Atlantic, the Mediterranean, and the Caribbean. These are the primary repositories of our industrial resources.

"We have long acknowledged that the Seaway opens the midcontinent's primary surpluses—grain and coal—to a more direct and economical export option. Of prospectively greater importance, it accords the midcontinent with the opportunity to conduct its merchandise trade in its own right. With respect to the merchandise or general cargo trades, the Seaway holds much more complex and enigmatic potential and the midcontinent is much less ably prepared and postured for their development than it is for the bulk movements where single companies, few decisions and a limited number of persons are concerned. The general cargo movement is the one in which the ports carry the primary mandates and responsibility and the one to which most of the remarks will doubtlessly be addressed today.

"I should like to point out, however, that although the bulk commodities tend to be largely autonomous, private, and self-initiating and have so far, except for grain, been considered outside most of the ports' focus of attention, they may be of a far larger order of importance in reshaping the economic structure of the midcontinent than the commercial general cargoes. It might further be considered whether these should be outside the authority of the lake port agencies which must, in the final analysis, make recommendations to the civic authorities for the control of further waterfront blighting; call the attention of industry and developmental agencies to the new spectrum of materials options and interpret their meaning to new industrial locations; and pursue a plan of integrated port development that has coherence, makes sense, and must ultimately reach far beyond the bounds of their present plants.

"I have merely touched in skeletal form on the essential elements of the Seaway-instituted change—a change of such magnitude as to defy exacting measurement. Though I have spent a number of years analyzing in considerable detail the new patterns of commodity and resource movements by the Seaway, I have by no means emerged with the feeling that my studies have embraced a significant part of the project's potential. I think it should be made abundantly clear that I do not count myself among the Seaway optimists; in fact, I hold the Seaway as essentially neutral. It does nothing for anyone; it merely holds out latent opportunities whose realization depends upon decisions and responses.

"The time is far past for raising the question I have been asked many times in the Lake States, 'What will the Seaway do for Podunk, Ohio?' The answer is, of course, 'Nothing.' The only question of relevance is 'What is Podunk, Ohio, going to do about the Seaway?' One witnesses throughout the midcontinent the misconception—the St. Nicholas myth of the St. Lawrence—which assumes that traffic has some magic capacity to suddenly volunteer itself from out of the hinterlands. One still finds numerous boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and metropolitan planning agencies 'waiting to see the traffic before acting.' They will doubtlessly be proved the prophets of the Seaway, for without acting there will be no traffic to be seen. The sooner the St. Nicholas myth of the St. Lawrence is abandoned, the sooner the vision of spontaneous bonanzas will give way to the reality of the larger tasks and issues the Seaway presents.

"Before addressing the port-related issues raised by the Seaway, we might examine the higher goals and purposes that the Seaway could serve—to see if they provide some guidance to the higher aspirations and larger responsibilities of the ports. Looking not to the legislative mandate but rather to the reality and potential of the Seaway, I would list and rank the higher goals of the Seaway in the following order:

"1. The primary purpose that the Seaway may serve is the fostering of better relations, closer cooperation, and the growing economic interdependence between Canada and the United States. This is the concept implicit in the spirit in which the Seaway was conceived and strengthened during the project's construction and will be reinforced by what will be primarily Canadian-United States trade through the Seaway. That we can no longer afford to take Canada for granted is all too clear from the coming of age of Canada, the rise of nationalism and the dangers of division in this crucial time in our history. We must recall that it was a small and aggressive Canada that dragged the United States into the Seaway late and embarrassed. Canada is not only our most reliable neighbor but our foremost trading partner and potentially our strongest political and military ally. The Seaway may well be the first step toward wider joint activities in the conservation and redevelopment of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system. The system is not only the world's foremost fresh water supply but the greatest mutual asset shared by any two nations of the world, a system so divided that all actions relating to it must inevitably be joint, a resource suffering of serious pollution and despoilation.

"Further, the Seaway should lead toward parallelism in commercial laws with Canada and could be a first step leading toward regional economic union. Although we are living in a time that should make for an almost inevitable jointness, there is a disconcerting undercurrent of division between the United States and Canada. Certainly if we are to preserve this cherished relationship, the United States will have to show a much higher order of initiative than it has in its entry into the Seaway project. A study of the history of the Seaway battle makes it abundantly clear that our failure of entry on the Seaway was a regional, as opposed to a national or governmental, failure and, in this respect, the apathy, political disunity and open hostility of many in the midcontinent was probably as responsible as the vociferous opposition of the so-called longtime enemies of the Seaway. Certainly a large share of the task of enlightenment and of leading the midcontinent to an early and correct assessment of the larger issues of Canadian-American relations resides with the lake ports.

"2. The United States and Canada, in striving to foster their growing political and economic relationships, should also be mindful of the need to preserve the international dimensions of the Seaway—the right of transit and freedom of commerce by way of the Seaway to oversea countries. Certainly our oversea allies have pioneered and developed the lakes-overseas trade. Equally certain is the fact that the trade route is a vulnerable one. It is vulnerable to time losses stemming from duplicating governmental commercial laws—the many and disparate navigation, customs, immigration and other commercial rules that apply to the vessels and commerce passing over it. It is also vulnerable to the impositions of almost two dozen pilotage, maritime, shore, and transport unions which, in moving toward unity, can visit upon the commerce an almost unlimited number of grievances and restraints. It is further vulnerable to the defensive tactics of the inland carriers to whom the ocean vessels are, in different instances, both complementary and competitive. We might well consider then the role of the ports in bringing an international view to the problems of the Seaway, making it an integral part of our foreign policy and in considering its implications to our national and domestic transport maritime policy. Certainly, we are in a strategic position to throttle ocean vessels, of either foreign or domestic registry, in their attempts to develop commerce over this formerly closed navigation system.

"3. These matters will be an essential condition to what we might call the emergency of a midcontinent in fact. Not only does the Seaway afford the promise of access to new resource foundations to the industrial structure of the midcontinent and a new spectrum of market opportunities for its abundant primary and manufactured surpluses, but it also provides some reason to hope for the formation of an economically, politically and socially united region. The midcontinent heretofore has existed either as a figment of the imagination or as statistical fiction—the east north central district, the west north central district or the Great Lakes States. It is not a unified and coherent region like the Pacific coast, the Southwest, the South, New England, or even eastern Canada or central Canada. The Seaway will send out trade arteries that may constitute a unifying thread which could knit this section of the country into a coherent and articulate region. If it does, one might hope for an abandonment of the residual elements of isolationism and insularity that have remained, even after World War II, and the emergence of a region with a larger and more responsible voice in all international economic and political affairs. Needless to say, the ports must choose a leading role if such a transition is to obtain.

"4. The fourth purpose to be served by the Seaway may well be to establish the capacity of a navigation project for self-liquidation and this concept is probably well worth preserving. Self-liquidation is a part of the legislative mandate, will afford the grounds for more equitable transport competition and, in the final analysis, may become a condition for the extension and duplication of the project. This by no means supports the idea that we should expect the Seaway to rise full-blown and self-liquidating in its first few years nor that we should become so attached to its profit and loss aspects as to permit them to defeat the other higher international and regional policy objectives. I fully realize that supporting tolls is akin to a politician favoring sin or taxes, in some of the lake cities, so I will merely acknowledge that this is an issue on which the ports will have to take an informed and responsible position. If they do not, it is entirely conceivable that their failure to do so will not only be injurious to fostering amity between Canada and the United States but may be inimicable to a consistent U.S. voice in Seaway matters. Fortunately, harassment and irresponsibility over tolls may have passed beyond the fevered pitch reached about 2 years ago.

"These may seem to be lofty and utopian purposes to ports struggling with the daily myriad details and decisions—and, in many instances, fighting for political survival. Yet if the ports, as agents and interpreters of an emergent midcontinent, lose sight of the higher goals, we are certain to realize less than the full potential of the Seaway for positive change. The Seaway is no longer just a matter of new commodity flows and commerce but becomes a distinct means of positively redirecting our international policy during a period of intensification of economic warfare.

"Port-related issues

"We view the lake ports in a moment of fundamental, grassroot, and yet revolutionary, transformation. Theirs is the task of changing from industrial to cosmopolitan ports; from primary local to international ports; from independent, private, and bulk commodity industrial backyards to commercial entrepôts responsible to and conducting much of the foreign trade of the heartland of the world's richest continent. Time is of essence, for the lake ports must accomplish in 5 to 10 years what has evolved at seaboard ports over the past 150 years. Yet the lake port agencies have, with few exceptions, been underpaid, undermanned, and under attack. They have, by and large, done an excellent job under trying circumstances. Where failures have occurred they have been more often community, State, and national failures rather than port agency failures.

"If my assessment of accomplishments seems unduly harsh or the weight of issues I place on their shoulders unduly burdensome, it arises from a sense of urgency and not from unsympathetic miscomprehension of the magnitude of the task.

"The Seaway raises a number of fundamental port-related issues. I shall merely state some of the observations I have drawn from a number of contacts with the lake ports, state the related issues and leave the harder job of answering them to this stalwart panel of experts.

"1. One finds in the study of lake ports a number of traffic projections and forecasts for the ports. In many instances, these studies were predicted on the static and standard assumptions of city size, distances, natural endowment, and make-up of "captive" (a dubious term) hinterlands. Further, they proceeded to forecast tonnage as though it were the inevitable and inalienable right of the port community, without acknowledging the task involved in its gathering. We might question whether we do, in fact, have a proper conception of ports, any model for port growth, any idea of how they evolve. Further, whether static assumptions and unimaginative research might not have robbed cities of much of their audacity and blinded them to the formidable realities involved in the task of becoming ports. If ports have no inalienable rights of economics or geography, we might ask, 'What is the spectrum of opportunities open to communities, even relatively small ones, for self-determination in becoming ports?'

"2. In the absence of a larger showing of initiative elsewhere—at the National, State, or even importer, exporter and industrial level—the lake ports will have to play the key role in initiating general cargo movements, orienting the midcontinent to the conduct of trade in its own right and, in the larger context, fostering the international emergence of political unity in the midcontinent. The questions are multiple. Does their enabling legislation equip or disable them for such an undertaking and, if defective, in what ways should it be reconstructed? Are they adequately organized, financed and manned for the assumption of such responsibilities? Have they been given adequate community, State and regional aid and support in their undertaking? Why have some succeeded in spite of adversity and others failed in spite of wide-scale public support? Is it a problem of leadership, organization and community motivation, or the carping attacks of local politicians and, uniquely enough, chambers of commerce?

"3. It appears clear that, as measured by their ocean counterparts or the Canadian lake ports, the pre-Seaway efforts of most U.S. lake ports have been limited and, more seriously, their long-term development plans are modest. Is the failure a local, State, or National failure? Since the United States is about the only Western nation which leaves port development entirely to local initiative, do we need a revision of national commercial policy to gain a wider voice participating in port development? Should the States, or even the regional hinterland, take a larger role in port development and participation in its financing?

"4. It appears clear that the scale of immediate port efforts or long-term plans has had little to do with the size of the metropolitan community, the immediacy with which the city will be contacted by 27-foot navigation, or even the potentialities of the community's supposedly captive hinterland. The questions again are hard to answer. To what guidelines should community port planning be tied? Certainly studies have had a limited effect on the magnitude or character of port responses. Detroit is perhaps the most studied and least responsive of the ports—and not because of any negative study findings. What new assumptions, approaches, insights, and methods should port studies be using? What informational voids, national and local, should be filled so that we cannot only study a community or region—say, as intelligently as Canada does—but also give it a realistic view of its stake in foreign trade? Further, who should be responsible for intelligent analysis, interpretation, and public information?

"5. The chief obstacles to port preparations appear to have risen variously: from policy mistakes of the distant past that have resulted in a vast blighting of the waterfront for navigation purposes; from lack of knowledge about the Seaway, ports, and economic potentials; from the exaggeration of the toll phantom; from the worst manifestations of local politics; and from the misunderstanding of the respective roles of the public voice and private enterprise in port development. These raise many questions and pose lessons too numerous to list here.

"6. The most ambitious and generally successful Seaway preparations have been undertaken in those cities that have preserved their waterfronts, exercised a voice in waterfront development and control, maintained a proper port image in the public mind, gained a sense of widespread private and public participation in the port activities and have been lucky or astute enough to man their port agencies with men of vision, immense energy, capacity for community leadership, and immunity to political assassination. There are no complete remedies for the historical mistakes of the lake ports nor is there any substitute for wisdom, vision, and leadership which still remain remarkably individual.

"A number of national policy issues respecting lake ports should be brought into sharp focus by the Seaway:

"1. Whether the national commerce policy, which is generous on navigable waterways but ill defined and vague with respect to ports—certainly of an equal importance—should be expanded to involve a voice and participation in port matters. It appears clearly evident that many of the lake port communities have permitted reckless blighting of their waterfronts and have assumed virtually no local initiative in responsibility for seaway preparations. The cost of such failure will not only be local but will involve loss to a good portion of the midcontinent.

"2. Whether great national or intergovernmental projects, such as the Seaway, hydroelectric, irrigation or other public projects, should be built, with the matter of utilization and discovery of their extent and limitations of usefulness left to chance. Public projects run the gamut from the TVA—in which farmers were taught crop rotation and use of the proper types of fertilizers, and mountain housewives were taught the nature and usefulness of electrical appliances—to the Seaway. The question is how far should the Seaway entities and other governmental agencies pursue traffic developmental, informational, and route protective activities?

"3. Whether the Federal Government should accord the lake ports recognition and treatment immediately or wait until they have demonstrated themselves, in fact, to be ocean ports. This might be asked in connection with the schedule and timing of priorities for lake port dredging, regulatory agency efforts, consideration given to placing the lake ports on inland carrier rate or service parity with the ocean ports and the according of gateway status to the lake ports by the Government agencies controlling the routing of much of the United States foreign aid, military shipments, agricultural exports and on other matters.

"4. Whether the Federal and Dominion Governments, the Seaway agencies, or an international Seaway Authority should assume the functions of fostering the trade routes' traffic development or of protecting the exposed route from arbitrary State, carrier, labor, or industrial infringements. Should trade development be left largely to local and private incentives but protection of the route from infringements by the eight or nine Government agencies, the eight States and two Provinces, the more than two dozen labor unions, and the numerous inland carrier and ocean conferences under whose auspices the commerce must move, be the task of an international authority or intergovernmental agency?

"The role of the ports

"In the absence of a clear expression of Government policy in these matters, it becomes particularly urgent that the role of the port agencies be expanded beyond the conventional ocean port tasks of informing the region, providing physical facilities for the dispatch of traffic and enlisting its flow through traffic developmental activities. The ports may have to assume the important function of voicing the whole region's interest in the Seaway. To do so, it is obvious that they will gain more strength through a collective front than through individual and dispersed efforts. We may someday see an effective association of all Great Lakes ports—Canadian and American—but, judging from the immediate, that day may be long in coming. There is today a Council of Lake Erie Ports, a Great Lakes Harbors Association, and informal monthly meetings of all major U.S. lake port officials, but so far there is no unified organization expressing articulately the interest of the midcontinent in the Seaway. The Great Lakes Commission, formed in 1955, may become the most effective agency. So far the commission has exercised an articulate voice, but it will lack authority on the larger issues until it has more direct and affirmative gubernatorial participation and more direct representation from midcontinent Canada.

"Whatever the form, effective collaboration of the lake ports will demand proper delineation of the areas in which their interests are competitive or common. One can, for instance, foresee them fighting jealously for traffic at borderline communities and collaborating effectively on the issues of port channel dredging, inland carrier rates and service rulings, priorities on lockages to be accorded foreign vessels, duplicating and binding commercial regulations, imminently dangerous shipping and trade restrictions, and a great range of other seaway questions that will soon come into clear focus. So far, the ports have been quicker to recognize and fight for their competitive interests, but the day may be not too distant when they will rise to recognize common interests.

"The promise that this program holds is in the early definition of common issues, challenges, and problems that the Seaway poses to a region. We are concerned with the international emergence of a midcontinent in which the lake ports bear an inordinate share of the responsibility for leadership."

INEQUITABLE CHANGES IN WILDLIFE PROGRAMS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement by me on the inequitable changes in wildlife programs, in connection with the distribution of funds for wildlife projects under the Pittman-Robertson Act; and I also ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a letter I have written to the Secretary of the Interior, the Honorable Fred Seaton.

There being no objection, the statement and the letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

Recently the Department of Interior revised the formula for distributing funds for wildlife projects under the Pittman-Robertson Act.

By a new interpretation of the statutes, the Department decided to allocate funds to States on the basis of "numbers of license holders" rather than on the formula utilized since the enactment of the law in 1937 (that is, the record of "licenses issued"). This will create real problems.

The change will: (1) result in an inequitable distribution of funds; and (2) necessitate costly surveys—estimated at $15,000–$30,000 for Wisconsin and proportionately high costs for other States—to determine the number of license holders.

The proposed revision of the formula does not take into account the fact that there are separate costs of management and maintenance of game programs—for which single hunters may purchase licenses.

We recall that, under the Pittman-Robertson Act, the States match Federal funds on a 25 percent basis to carry on acquisition, maintenance, and restoration of wildlife projects. The funds are obtained by collection of an excise tax on firearms and ammunition. After deducting administrative costs and certain statutory aids to territories, the money is reapportioned to the States—according to a formula allocating 50 percent of the money according to land area, and (until now) 50 percent on the basis of licenses issued to hunters.

Recently, I introduced legislation, S. 1021, to redefine the statutes along the lines by which the Department has administered the program since its enactment in 1937. Fortunately, initial hearings have been held on the bill by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. I sincerely hope that the committee will find it possible to complete action on this legislation in the near future.

In view of the facts that (1) the Department's action represented a far-reaching change in the program; and (2) legislation is being considered in the Senate, I have urged the Secretary of Interior to hold up action on the decision until Congress can take a new look at this program.

APRIL 13, 1959.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am writing to express my opposition to action by the Department of Interior to change the formula for distributing Federal funds for wildlife projects under the Pittman-Robertson Act.

The Department's recent decision to allocate funds on the basis of numbers of "paid license holders" rather than on the record of "licenses issued" will result in: (1) an inequitable distribution of funds to States; (2) additional costs—estimated at $15 to $30,000 in Wisconsin—and proportionately high costs in other States—for surveys to determine the number of license holders.

The new interpretation of the provisions of the Pittman-Robertson Act would, as you know, actually represent a drastic change in administration of the law. Funds for the program, until now, have been distributed on the basis of the record of licenses. Now, without a change in the statute, the Department proposes to radically change the formula for distribution of money to the States.

As you may be aware, I have introduced legislation (S. 1021) to more clearly define the statutes—along the lines by which the Department has administered the program since 1937. Hearings have been initiated on this legislation.

Any administrative action to revise the fund-distribution formula, I believe, should be held in abeyance until Congress can consider this legislation and take a new look at the overall program.

Consequently, I again respectfully urge the Department to hold up action on the decision until Congress can act on this legislation.

Looking forward to hearing from you and with kindest personal regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER WILEY.

CITY-FEDERAL COOPERATION

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, one of the highlights of last week's meeting of the American Society for Public Administration in Washington was an address delivered by the Honorable Raymond R. Tucker, mayor of St. Louis, Mo.

In his remarks, "A Mayor Looks At Washington," Mayor Tucker pointed up some of the steps which he believes the Federal Government should take to assure progressive and orderly development of our urban areas.

Raymond Tucker is one of the distinguished mayors of our country. During his administration St. Louis has moved ahead on a dynamic program of urban redevelopment. The Mill Creek Valley project alone will replace 465 acres of decay in the center of the city with a beautiful, well-planned series of housing projects and commercial buildings.

Mayor Tucker has an outstanding record and breadth of experience on urban problems. All those interested in the vital question of city-Federal relations will find his views of real value. In the years ahead, the Congress will be devoting considerable attention to this field.

For this reason, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the speech delivered by Mayor Tucker at the 20th annual conference of the American Society for Public Administration be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A MAYOR LOOKS AT WASHINGTON

(By Mayor Raymond R. Tucker)

President Macy, distinguished guests, members and friends of the American Society for Public Administration, it is quite an honor to be here this afternoon. First, I have the opportunity to address your distinguished organization of teachers and practitioners of the art of administration.

Second, I have this opportunity on the occasion of the 20th anniversary of your society. May I add my appreciation to that of so many other administrators for the outstanding contributions made to the theory and practice of public administration through your efforts. Your journal, other publications, and services have maintained the highest professional reputation.

I certainly hope and expect that your success will be equally great over the coming decades.

As you know, the topic of my talk today is "A Mayor Looks at Washington." Some days ago, a friend of mine, hearing that I would address you on that subject, added, "and sees the green stuff."

His remark was, of course, intended to be facetious. Yet I wonder if he was not expressing a view that some people hold. Such a view would encompass the attitude that mayors and local government officials come to Washington cynically pursuing self-interest, looking for financial handouts for projects for which their local communities have neither the will nor the means.

In some circles it is quite fashionable to describe the Washington-oriented efforts of local governments as evasions of their responsibilities. The charge has been made that local governments are becoming weak and flabby as a result of dependence upon Federal financial largess.

It should come as no surprise to you that I emphatically reject these contentions.

Indeed, it is with a real sense of pride that I participate with so many of my fellow mayors in underscoring the need for continued Federal action in many policy fields which affect local governments.

I think that local officials would be derelict in their duties if they were not to fight for the adoption of such national policies.

I believe any reasonable person, studying the national municipal policy of the American Municipal Association, would recognize that some of the crucial domestic problems of our age are considered in that comprehensive series of recommendations.

Urban renewal and public housing, airports, water pollution, are typical of the topics included which require Federal action.

However, this broad-gaged approach to the policy questions of our urban areas is by no means to be considered limited to topics requiring Federal action.

It is here that I believe the role of our cities and their governments has been misunderstood. Cities have by no means been falling down on their job.

In reality, the little recorded and little understood story is the dramatic degree with which cities have accepted the massive challenges of the 20th century.

Local governments maintain a total monthly employee payroll of over $300 million more than the total monthly Federal payroll.

The borrowing and repaying of money by city government is second only to the Federal Government. Local government spends more tax dollars than the States, hires more employees than the States.

Since 1902, local government expenditures from their own revenue sources have increased from $828 million per anum to close to $18 billion per annum in 1956.

A more significant trend in the relative position of governmental expenditures is emphasized in last year's report of the House Committee on Governmental Operations on Federal-State-Local Relations. The report, speaking of the growth of government, declares:

"The components of the Federal budget not directly related to war and defense * * * increased from an estimated $9.2 billion to $14.5 billion during the years 1946–56, a period in which the general expenditures of State and local governments more than tripled."

Recently, in making for another purpose some comparisons in our St. Louis city budget, I noted that the budget of the health division had increased 10 times since 1914. There was no money allocated in 1914 for traffic control. Our hospital budget was less than 6 percent of its current level. You know by how much I could extend this list.

Such statistics about the tremendous growth of city government reflect, of course, basic substantive policies. This growth is the response of the cities to specific, vital problems.

I mentioned the tenfold increase in the St. Louis Health Division budget since 1914. This increase really means in substantive terms the current presence of specific sections of the Division dealing with meat control, food control, rat control, mosquito control, mental hygiene and industrial hygiene.

You will all recognize these services—and I'm only citing one kind of example—to be the result of demands upon Government brought about by our highly urbanized, industrialized society. This kind of example deals with service functions accepted in this century—functions which, of course, have become regularly accepted and taken for granted.

Our cities have accepted these functions. A safe and healthful city life in the industrial age made them inescapable.

Our cities accepted cultural and recreational functions, recognizing that concentrated populations needed more than the merest physical amenities. How often do we recognize the national contribution made at the local level of government by our great public libraries and art museums?

Before a mayor even begins to look at Washington, he is aware of a magnificent heritage of accomplishment by city government.

However, no society can remain static, resting upon past accomplishments. We are all aware of the fundamental changes of the era of "the exploding metropolis."

Sweeping population changes have changed the face of our urban areas. Similarly, technology is revising the structure and organization of our industry.

Following these changes, came the metropolitan "explosion." The impact of this explosion was primarily recognized after the Second World War, and we are still behind in our efforts to cope with it.

There are certain outstanding phases of this most recent metropolitan development: (1) The rapid dispersal of former city residents over large surburban areas; (2) the dense concentration of new residents from rural areas in older sections of the city; (3) the absence of adequate land in the old city for new type industrial facilities; (4) the obsolescence of existing central city industrial and commercial facilities.

From these phases develop particular city problems: (1) The erosion of the tax base; (2) increasing inadequacy of mass transit; (3) parallel exacerbation of the traffic and parking problems; (4) the almost amoeba-like spread of slums and blight; (5) deterioration of existing patterns of zoning and land usage; (6) increased needs of public services in crowded lower income residential areas.

With all these new demands, our cities must nevertheless attempt to maintain existing traditional services and keep up their existing capital investment in structures and equipment.

The success of our cities in meeting these problems is an issue of paramount national concern. Close to 80 percent of our population now live in metropolitan areas, and the large central cities are finally responsible for the economic and social health of those areas.

The phases of the metropolitan "explosion" which I have described and their resultant city problems are the result of trends national in character. The effective meeting of these problems is, in so highly urbanized a society, crucial to national security and economic well-being. And if we are to develop in our national character the principles of the good life, of a better civilization, we had best see to it that our cities provide the necessary environment for such development.

Thus, our cities, having met the first wave of 20th century problems, are now coping with a new wave of problems national in character and importance.

It is to these newer problems that mayors are addressing themselves when they look at Washington and seek adoption of new public policies. It is indeed true that some of the Federal policies sought are costly, but I suspect that in terms of the long-range urban needs of the Nation we may have asked for too little.

I need not review too closely for this audience the kinds of programs cities advocate at the Federal level. Slum clearance, urban renewal, public housing, hospitals and health, highways, airports, water pollution, area redevelopment—these are the typical basic fields in which Federal funds are sought.

Remember, of course, that even here Federal funds are sought on a shared basis, with local initiative, participation, and money involved. But cities cannot, on an individual basis successfully attack problems which are the result of underlying broad national trends. It must further be emphasized that for the most part the functions for which joint Federal-city action is sought are above and beyond the traditional burdens of local government.

We have engaged in tremendous programs of Federal support to agriculture. Mayors must look to Washington for substantive support for the new problems of a Nation 80 percent urban in character.

I know, too, that you all understand that the cities are severely limited in their available tax sources by State constitutions and statutes. Federal, State, and local taxes compose more than 27 percent of the total national income. Almost 75 percent of this tax total is Federal in character.

Cities, frankly, have strained their fiscal resources to the breaking point. In St. Louis, we have turned to the earnings tax as a partial alleviation of the problem. Yet in face of the overwhelming Federal seclusion of tax sources, local fiscal flexibility is severely limited.

Since we have adopted major programs of Federal participation and since we shall see such programs continued and expanded, I expect to find new institutional arrangements evolving in intergovernmental relations.

Such new relationships are developing among the various levels of government. This follows logically since no dynamic society can express itself through inflexible structural arrangements.

Because of the developing intergovernmental involvements, the mayor of a large city will find much of his time devoted to coordinating relationships, or participating in efforts to coordinate relationships between different agencies of different governments.

Typical efforts come to mind. A new city expressway will terminate at the city line. Conferences are held by city officials, county officials, and officers of county municipalities to work out solutions to the impact of the new road.

As the great new Jefferson National Expansion Memorial in St. Louis comes nearer to realization, continual conferences—and I must say these relationships have been excellent—between the city and National Park Service are necessary to work out our mutual living arrangements.

Direct relationships exist between the city's land clearance authority and the Urban Renewal Administration in the Housing and Home Finance Agency. Sometimes we think in this area there is too much Federal oversight of operational details, and we feel that greater delegations of authority could be made to regional offices of such a Federal agency.

You can readily see the intergovernmental involvements in flood control and highways. Here the problems are continuing, and regularized relationships develop between the officials and technicians involved.

Sometimes a particular problem of governments working at cross purposes will drop out of a clear blue sky. Recently one large Federal governmental installation was scheduled for downtown St. Louis without any notification to the city planning commission, or any agency of city government. Only after stumbling upon these plans while seeking to develop the site for municipal purposes have we been able to begin the effort to come to a mutually satisfactory agreement about the proper land use of the area.

For the most part, respectable cooperative relationships develop for each specific program between the Federal, State, and local officials involved.

I think the more difficult program of cooperation lies in those areas where different programs have an effect on each other. Here the institutional developments for coordination have been slower in emerging. Yet progress is being made in exploring the interdependent implications of expressway building and urban renewal, for example, in our cities.

In creating specific policies for particular problems, there was a natural tendency to overlook the probable effects of one policy upon another. Consider the difficulties, for example, if one agency of government announces plans for an expressway running through an area in which another agency is successfully expanding a neighborhood rehabilitation project.

There remains then a vast need for coordination between programs as well as the more obvious need for coordination within one program of the activities of different levels of government.

Possibly more fundamental than the need for coordination is the gap in our understanding of the long-range impact of particular ad hoc policies. What, for example, are the desirable limits to the creation of urban expressways? What are the effects of expressways on the way of life in the central city and its outlying areas? What is the relationship between expressway building and the future of mass transit?

I feel that these underlying problems of coordination and of the need for fundamental and continuing urban research suggest the advisability of an administrative focal point within the Federal Government for urban matters.

I have long supported recommendations for the creation of a Cabinet-level Department of Urban Affairs. Such Cabinet recognition would fit the facts of our metropolitan society. It would provide the institutional basis for coordinating and assessing our public policies in the urban field.

More importantly, in the political sense, such a Cabinet department would bring dramatic recognition to the major domestic policy issues. It would create a responsible focal point at which the concern and understanding of any national administration for city problems could be evaluated.

A Cabinet Department of Urban Affairs would bring to the executive branch of the Federal Government a spokesmanship for our urban communities. Sometimes we city officials feel at a loss to to precisely where our friends are in the the executive branch.

Do not mistake me. I certainly do not mean that there are not many Federal administrators trained and understanding in the areas which concern cities. I have known and worked well with many of them.

What I am concerned about is the absense in the executive branch of any institutionalized location of a responsible overall view of urban affairs and Federal-urban relations.

Recognizing the tremendous problem of reorganization necessary in establishing a full Department of Urban Affairs, the American Municipal Association has recommended a Council of Urban Advisors. This Council could begin the basic research necessary to determine the nature of a new Department and the role it could best play.

These steps are long overdue. The role of our cities in the national economy must be fully recognized.

I have noticed, I must add, a generally sympathetic recognition of urban problems within the Congress. We all know that cities do not receive all that they request from the Congress, but we would hardly expect that. It is very clear, however, that within the Senate and the House, there are some dedicated and effective leaders of the urban point of view.

I have talked of institutional arrangements for bettering our city-Federal programs and relationships. I am sure that this audience, far better than most, knows that the really effective working of such relationships, no matter what the structural arrangements, depends on the individuals in administrative capacities.

The ability, understanding, and human character of these people is crucial to the development and execution of successful programs. I might add that these attributes are essential at all levels of the administrative structure.

I sometimes think that the contribution and significance of regional and local offices of Federal departments depends most on the variable of the kind of administrator in the office. One administrator in such a post may simply pass on his strictly interpreted version of central directives.

Another administrator in the same spot may have the wisdom—and the courage—to present his superiors with the local point of view. He may even—within his broad directives—attempt to show the merit of such a point of view.

I am sure you know the kind of administrator I prefer. Fortunately, such men exist in all levels of Government service.

My topic today "A Mayor Looks at Washington" relieves me of examining our deficiencies at the local level. We struggle under antiquated charters and in suburban areas almost hopeless jurisdictional hodgepodges. We face difficult fiscal problems and have difficulties attracting adequate personnel to city service. But today I could take a vacation from these things by looking at Washington.

I think that those of us who deal in the area of urban problems face the most inspiring and stimulating challenge of our times.

We know that we live in metropolitan aggregations of people. Our job is to attempt to assure that these aggregations are communities for civilized living.

I have the confidence that we can build a great urban future if we have the vision and perseverance to meet today's challenges.

Thank you.

TUESDAY EVENING INFORMAL ROUND TABLE DISCUSSIONS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in an age in which the Congress is confronted with many complex issues, there is an ever-increasing need for greater understanding of the intricate and perplexing problems which exist. Some time ago several of my colleagues and I were discussing the desirability of some informal roundtable discussions of a few of the most pressing issues of our time.

Partly as a result of this conversation, but mostly because of my own feeling of need for such background information, I invited Prof. Henry A. Kissinger of Harvard University to lead a discussion last Tuesday evening on the general subject of "Central European Security." I invited my Democratic colleagues to come, have dinner together, and join in a brief discussion. I found the observations of Dr. Kissinger and of my fellow Senators on international affairs enlightening and provocative. Several of my colleagues have voiced similar sentiments.

Because of the excellent response to the first discussion meeting, a second has been scheduled for tomorrow evening, and it is contemplated that the series will continue each Tuesday throughout April and May. Each week a guest who is especially equipped by learning and experience will be invited to present briefly his views on a timely topic and to conduct a discussion period.

Although invitations have been confined to Democratic Senators, the discussions are not intended to be of a partisan nature. Some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle have spoken to me about the meetings, and I have received a number of inquiries from members of congressional office and committee staffs, the press, and private citizens who would like to attend these meetings. However, because of the nature of the discussion program and the available facilities, the discussion group must necessarily be limited in number.

Dr. Raymond L. Garthoff, author of the book entitled "Soviet Strategy in the Nuclear Age," which I have found most interesting and informative, has kindly consented to lead the discussion tomorrow evening based upon the general subject area of his book. Dr. Garthoff is regarded as an expert on Soviet military organization and strategy.

Dr. Gardiner C. Means will be the invited guest April 21 for the third roundtable discussion meeting. His subject will be "Inflation, Employment and Growth."

Mr. President, I take this opportunity to invite my Democratic colleagues to the Old Supreme Court Chamber of the Capitol tomorrow evening at 6 p.m. and each succeeding Tuesday evening through May to participate in an informal discussion of some of the pressing problems which confront each of us as U.S. Senators. I am sure they will find these brief meetings worthwhile.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. May I congratulate the distinguished Senator from Tennessee for having conceived and in effect being, the father of these meetings.

It was my privilege to be present at the first meeting. I say to my able friend, that since I have been a Member of the Senate I have never been more impressed than I was not only by the remarks made by Dr. Kissinger, but also by the planning for the meeting and the dispatch with which it was carried on. It could have only been the result of careful preparation and thought on the part of the Senator from Tennessee.

These meetings are as constructive as anything in which it has been my privilege to participate since becoming a Member of the Senate. Again I congratulate the very able Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished friend, the junior Senator from Missouri, for his generous remarks.

The duties of Members of the Senate are so numerous and pressing that we find it difficult to become expert in the many fields with respect to which we have specific responsibilities. I find it very helpful to spend an evening with an authority, with an intellectual, who has had the time to specialize in a particular field.

It is not surprising that scholars such as Dr. Garthoff, Dr. Means, Dr. Kissinger, and others who will be invited can bring to us a wealth of knowledge and a fresh point of view which will prove provocative and helpful.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

INSPECTION AND CONTROL OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, today Ambassador Wadsworth has suggested to the Soviets in Geneva that if they persist in their intransigence and in their unwillingness to accept a means of inspection and control adequate to assure compliance with a treaty to stop all nuclear weapons tests, they should agree now to stop tests in the atmosphere, from which radioactive fallout comes.

I hope the Soviets will accept this suggestion on the part of the United States and Great Britain as an act of good faith. It had been my hope that President Eisenhower would take the initiative in a more dramatic way and announce to the world that the United States would stop, for a period of, say, 3 years, all atmospheric nuclear weapons tests, and then invite the Soviets and the British to join in the consummation of a treaty which would make such stoppage permanent.

If the Soviets refuse to accept the suggestion which the Ambassador has made in the name of the United States, I hope the President will still consider stopping such tests unilaterally and unconditionally for a definite period and still seek to persuade other nuclear powers to join in such stoppage and to make it permanent.

I believe that the suggestion which our Government has now made, with the concurrence of the British, is constructive, wise, and humane. It is in the interest of humanity throughout the world. If accepted, it would bring to an end the contamination of the air, which all mankind must breathe, by nuclear tests in the atmosphere of the earth. This would be an important step. It would also be a major first step toward disarmament, which is a problem separate and apart from the antisocial act of contaminating the earth's atmosphere. It would also be an important first step in the establishment of a world organization for inspection and control. If this first step could be realized, it might well lead to a broader understanding and agreement in this important field.

I hope that the Soviets will accept the suggestion in the good faith in which it is offered, and that a treaty, at least in this limited field, can be consummated.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the negotiations at Geneva between representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union on the discontinuance of nuclear weapons tests, are being resumed this month. The importance to mankind of these negotiations cannot be overemphasized. I have pointed out on other occasions the importance I attach to the continuance of these negotiations, so that there can never be any doubt in anyone's mind as to the sincerity of our purpose and the determination of the Government of the United States to bring about an effective agreement. I hope that our Government will at least embrace the proposals of an agreement with respect to atmospheric tests. This should be the irreducible minimum. I am hopeful that in the days to come, as these negotiations are resumed, the Government will propose in detailed form the discontinuance of nuclear tests in the atmosphere under international inspection, which will provide us, first, with an inspection apparatus which is internationalized and, secondly, reduce one of the real dangers to mankind, namely, nuclear fallout.

Mr. President, one of our fellow Senators, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], has made a proposal relating to the discontinuance of atmospheric nuclear tests. It is my considered judgment that his proposal merits the support of our Government and the support of Congress. I am happy to join with him in that proposal but I express the opinion that negotiations for a broader agreement should be continued at the same time.

So that my proposal may be clearly understood, I recommend that our Government proceed at once to try to obtain an agreement on discontinuance of nuclear bomb tests in the atmosphere, under international inspection; secondly, that we continue to pursue our efforts toward a broader agreement under international inspection.

I doubt very much that results will be obtained on the broader agreement until the summit conference. I am sure that the Soviets would like to build up as many issues for the summit conference as possible. Nevertheless, we should press relentlessly, effectively, and consistently for the elimination, on a joint basis, of atmospheric and nuclear bomb tests.

Of real concern is the danger of fallout resulting from nuclear tests. Never before in history has the human race been subject to such a danger against which there is so little defense. Radioactive fallout is the unseen enemy which threatens us all regardless of geography or national origin. Radioactive fallout is today a matter of most serious concern not only to our Government but to all other governments throughout the world.

In the April 16 issue of the Reporter magazine Senator FRANK CHURCH has written an excellent article on this very subject entitled "We Must Stop Poisoning the Air" in which he not only tells of the danger mankind faces, but also comes forth with a thoughtful proposal to end fallout from nuclear weapons.

I wish to take this occasion to commend Senator CHURCH not only for his fine article, but also for the hard and constructive work he has been doing as a member of the Subcommittee on Disarmament. Senator CHURCH has demonstrated those qualities of intelligence, thoughtfulness, and imagination which are so sorely needed in today's troubled world. It has been a genuine pleasure to work with him in this field of disarmament, as in other fields.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the article by Senator CHURCH to which I have referred be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE MUST STOP POISONING THE AIR

(By Senator FRANK CHURCH, of Idaho)

The negotiations in Geneva to end all further tests of nuclear weapons, launched with such high expectations last October, froze with the Alpine winter. Now, after an Easter recess, the negotiators of the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union are resuming the talks. Soon the spring will turn Switzerland green again, but in Geneva there seems to be little promise for a thaw at the conference table.

We went to Geneva in good faith and with stout hope. We sought an agreement among the three nuclear powers by which the signatories should agree to suspend all further nuclear tests within the framework of a trustworthy international system of detection and control to safeguard against covert violations. At an earlier conference in Geneva last summer, the scientists of all three countries had agreed upon the structure of the technical detection system required. Thus a blueprint had been furnished in advance.

But from the beginning the Russian negotiators have stubbornly put forward impossible demands. They insist upon a veto over the operation of the proposed international control commission; they demand that the requisite control posts on Russian soil be operated by Russian nationals; they call for endless redtape that would frustrate timely action by the commission in dispatching mobile teams for on-site investigations of subterranean disturbances suspected of being nuclear in origin.

It is well to remember that the Russians were a suspicious people long before the Communists came to power. The Czars maintained their own Iron Curtain. Khrushchev may be exhibiting this age-old habit of suspicion when he charges that we really want military reconnaissance of his country in the guise of roving inspection teams probing into the remote corners of Russia to check on every earthquake. But whether deceitful or sincere, this Russian obstinacy has proved an effective barrier to the agreement sought at Geneva. Present methods of detection seem to require that one-site inspections be carried out if the ban is to cover all underground tests including those within the one- to twenty-kiloton range.

Although Russians are clearly to blame for the deadlock that now grips the Geneva negotiations, there are nevertheless those in high station at the Pentagon and in the AEC who are quietly applauding. The Soviets' mulishness, they feel, serves them right, while it serves us well. Given our country's increasing dependence upon nuclear weapons, both for deterrence and defense, they argue that more tests are needed to refine our atomic warheads and to chart new discoveries in antimissilery. From the outset, these men have not approved of our journey to Geneva. They hail the Russian stubbornness as providential, offering us an honorable exit to walk the road back.

Now it is true that the results of the latest tests, conducted underground and in outer space, tend to support the argument that an all-inclusive test ban might impede the progress of our weaponry. It follows, of course, that the military interests of the Soviet Union are affected in a like manner, and I have little doubt that the Soviet generals are saying so. Thus the pressures mount, on either side, to let the conference die.

GENERATIONS YET UNBORN

Yet men of good conscience everywhere are deeply troubled at the prospect of failure at Geneva. Our most fundamental instincts tell us that we must stop poisoning the air. It is life's element. If nuclear tests continue unabated, we shall seed the air with ever-mounting quantities of strontium 90, carbon 14, and cesium 137, to sift silently and relentlessly down upon us. This invisible rain, latest disclosures show, is falling faster and more lethally than we have heretofore been led to believe. Some samples of Minnesota wheat have carried radioactive levels approaching the "permissible maximum," while certain Dakota milk has shown contamination as high as 40 percent of the "tolerable limit." Actually, these so-called maximums are hardly safe. The best scientific estimates hold that if strontium 90 alone reaches the designated "permissible" limit in the human body, it could increase the incidence of leukemia by more than 20 percent. And the effect of this level of radioactivity on the incidence of other diseases would have to be added to this toll. Indeed, we cannot even calculate the extent of its grotesque effect upon generations yet unborn. It is therefore imperative that the Geneva conference not be forsaken while any hope remains for a meaningful agreement.

Is there a way to break the stalemate? Certainly we must try; and there is considerable feeling in the Senate that we have not been trying hard enough. Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, chairman of the Disarmament Subcommittee of the Senate, has done much to alert the country to the significance of the Geneva negotiations as a key to the larger problem of disarmament itself. Senator ALBERT GORE has spoken up from the depth of his conviction that the United States bears a special responsibility, as the Nation that first unleashed the atom and let fall the only two atomic bombs ever detonated in war. He has proposed that the United States unilaterally declare a 3-year moratorium on nuclear tests in the earth's atmosphere, while reserving to ourselves the right to continue testing underground and in outer space. The eloquence of these two men, together with the smoldering indignation of Senator CLINTON ANDERSON, chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, has deeply affected the Senate.

For my own part, I have been moved to study closely the dilemma at Geneva, and I have concluded that there is still hope of salvaging something of value, for humanity's sake, at the conference table. In this 11th hour, I have proposed that the United States and the United Kingdom seek agreement with the Soviet Union to suspend all nuclear weapons tests in the earth's atmosphere, conditioned upon a workable international control system adequate to detect and report any violation. Such a proposal would exclude, for the present, any agreement involving suspension of nuclear tests occurring underground or in outer space, neither of which contributes to the pollution of the air.

IT COULD BE A BEGINNING

Such a ban on atmospheric tests would abruptly end the further poisoning of the air. This grave anxiety would be erased from among the apprehensions of our distraught world. Moreover, a first international apparatus would be established in the field of nuclear test controls. It would be a functioning harness within which to bind not only the present members of the nuclear club but also the oncoming nations that are fast developing atomic technologies of their own. In the accomplishment of this objective, the negotiating parties at Geneva share a common interest.

We must not lose sight of what such a breakthrough in creating an international control system might portend for our atomic age. It is the sine qua non for any meaningful progress toward future goals of prevention of surprise attack and of disarmament. Moreover, successful operations of such a control system might easily pave the way for its expansion to embrace a broader test ban, of the kind we have been seeking at Geneva, encompassing all types of nuclear tests in space and underground.

Is there any real chance the Soviets will accept a properly policed ban on atmospheric tests? We cannot know, of course, unless we put the proposal to them. But there is at least ground for hope.

The fact that atmospheric explosions can be monitored largely from fixed control stations, eliminating the need for on-site investigations, should allay any genuine fears the Russians may have about roving foreign reconnaissance within their country. On the other hand, if their fears are simulated, what better way could we find to expose them than by offering an international detection and control system that can safely end the slow pollution of the atmosphere without possibly doing them any internal mischief?

In addition, an atmospheric test ban could not jeopardize the military interests of either side. Outer space and the depths of the earth offer ample laboratories for further experimentation, should more be needed or wanted.

Of course it may be the Russians will rebuff this proposal, and all others that might be acceptable to the United Kingdom and the United States. If so, Russia will have forced us to take the grim road back from Geneva. But then, at least, we could walk that road without shame, knowing we had done our utmost to avoid it.

It will be an eternal burden upon our conscience if we do less.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should add that the proposals I have made today, which are in part the proposals of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] and the proposal on the continuation of negotiations on the broad program of inspection and agreement on the prohibition of nuclear tests, should be taken seriously by our Government and should be presented in the most comprehensive, frank, and sincere manner to the representatives of the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union on the resumption of negotiations at Geneva.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I wish to commend the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and also the distinguished junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH]. Together they make a great team. Their work in the field of disarmament is of the greatest interest to our country.

I hope the Senator from Minnesota will continue to speak on disarmament and nuclear testing, because they are subjects which must be kept constantly before us. Someone must keep pounding away in these areas. They are perhaps the most important subjects confronting the world today. I wish the Senator from Minnesota to know that I am grateful for his continued interest in this field.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator. I am very grateful to him for his kind remarks.

NATIONAL FUELS POLICY

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have at hand an invitation from the national coal policy conference to a dinner on the subject of a national fuels policy for this country. The dinner is to take place at the Statler Hotel here on the evening of April 27, and is to feature speakers from the utility industry, the railroad industry, and the coal industry—including John L. Lewis for the United Mine Workers.

I am told that all members of the Congress have been invited and I hope that my colleagues will attend, if possible. I realize the tremendous demands upon their time, including many invitations to dinner. I know that nothing would please most of us more than the opportunity to spend a quiet evening at home. Nevertheless, the bituminous coal industry, one of the country's major industries, is not in too good shape. Today, in almost every coal area there is unemployment. Production last year was close to 400 million tons, one of the worst years from that standpoint in coal's history.

The theme of the dinner, which is sponsored by the national coal policy conference, is "Why a National Fuels Policy?" The conference, as Senators may know, is a unique organization in itself, being composed of the leading coal producing concerns, the United Mine Workers of America, coal carrying railroads, coal equipment manufacturers, and electric utilities.

As I understand, the dinner on April 27 is the beginning of a campaign for a national fuels policy by the conference, representing the coal industry and related groups. The claim is being made that we have an oil policy, a gas policy, an atom policy, but not a policy which takes all fuels and their proper relationship to energy demands into account.

In addition to Mr. Lewis, speakers at the coal dinner will include: Philip Sporn, president of the American Electric Power Service Corp., of New York, and Howard E. Simpson, president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. George H. Love, chairman of the board of the Consolidation Coal Co., of Pittsburgh, and chairman of the national coal policy conference, will preside.

At the dinner, some of the reasons for a national fuels policy will be stated, as well as some reasons for the situation of the coal industry. I know that the attendance of Senators at the dinner would be heartening to the coal industry. I feel also that the viewpoint of the spokesmen for the coal and related industries would be helpful to us all in considering and perhaps formulating an overall fuels policy.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY FISH RUNS IN RIVERS OF THE UNITED STATES—ARTICLE BY SENATOR NEUBERGER

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, on March 16, 1959, I introduced S. 1420, a bill to provide some restraints on issuance of waterpower project licenses by the Federal Power Commission in areas involving fish and wildlife values. Controls such as I have proposed are necessary to prevent construction of dams which would create insurmountable barriers to valuable runs of migratory fish. Unless authority exists outside the Federal Power Commission to rule on the advisability of dam construction in fish-spawning areas, I fear that a large portion of runs of anadromous salmon and steelhead in the Columbia River Basin will be doomed to extinction.

My views on S. 1420 and reasons for introducing it are detailed in an article which I have written for the April 1959, issue of Outdoor America, the official publication of the Izaak Walton League of America. Accompanying my article, the magazine also has published a brief statement by Mr. Joseph W. Penfold, the able and informed conservation director of the Izaak Walton League, explaining the intent and purpose of S. 1420. Mr. Penfold emphasizes that "existing law simply provides no reliable means for protecting fish and wildlife values in FPC licensing procedures—power is the Commission's specialty." I ask consent to include in the body of the RECORD with my remarks, my article from the April 1959, issue of Outdoor America, entitled "A New Fisheries-Power Partnership," and Mr. Penfold's statement entitled "What FPC-Wildlife Bill Could Accomplish."

There being no objection, the article and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Outdoor America, April 1959]

A NEW FISHERIES-POWER PARTNERSHIP

(By Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, of Oregon)

I

"The number of salmon in the river is incredible, to say the least." So wrote the explorers, Meriwether Lewis and William Clark, at the end of that first of all pilgrimages by Americans across this mighty continent. They were paddling down the Columbia River, where the salmon were so thick that the soldiers of the expedition could spear them with bayonets. "Never have so many fish been collected together in one place before," reported Lewis and Clark to their patron, President Thomas Jefferson.

That was slightly more than a century and a half ago. In the interval, white men have logged off forests, clogged rivers with sewage and offal, built dams and irrigation ditches. The Columbia is still one of the world's great fishery resources, but the abundance which amazed Lewis and Clark is gone. Tributary after tributary has been blockaded off as a spawning ground for migratory salmon.

Today, I am proposing a law which seeks to help protect such of our salmon runs as still survive. My proposal is simple. It would give the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service authority to pass upon fish-passage facilities before the Federal Power Commission could license a dam across any river or stream inhabited by anadromous fish. I am convinced that, unless some protective step such as this is taken, our remaining salmon and steelhead fisheries could be virtually wiped out—to become as one in extinction with the passenger pigeon and wild bison.

My bill would add this brief sentence to the Federal Power Act: "That no license affecting fish and wildlife resources shall be issued until the plans of the dam or other structures affecting such fish and wildlife resources have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior."

In 1958 this proposal was sharply attacked on the Senate floor as bad legislative practice because it presumably would give to the Fish and Wildlife Service veto power over the FPC.

Yet, for 38 years, the following sentence has been part and parcel of the Federal Power Act: "That no license affecting the navigable capacity of any navigable waters of the United States shall be issued until the plans of the dam or other structures affecting navigation have been approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of the Army."

In other words, my bill merely seeks to afford migratory fisheries exactly the same protection against indiscriminate FPC licensing that navigation has enjoyed for over a third of a century.

And, so far as any veto power is concerned, I think the best answer to that has been offered in a succinct paragraph written by J. W. Penfold, conservation director of the Izaak Walton League. Last August, Joe declared in a letter to me: "There has been objection to the enactment of this legislation on the grounds that it would give fish and wildlife considerations veto power over power considerations. Essentially this would be true, in the same sense that navigation considerations now have such veto power. We could point out that FPC now has life-and-death veto power over fish and wildlife."

Joe Penfold's statement is founded on demonstrable facts. The FPC had veto power over the survival of one of the Northwest's major steelhead migrations when it licensed Pelton Dam of the Portland General Electric Co. on the Deschutes River—despite protests by the Fish and Wildlife Service and the Oregon State Game and Fish Commissions. Identical veto power over the salmon migrations of the Cowlitz River was wielded by FPC when it disregarded the opposition of the Fish and Wildlife Service and Washington State conservation agencies, and licensed the Mayfield Dam of Tacoma's municipal light system.

And now a crisis impends for fisheries which makes mild, indeed, what has happened on the Deschutes and Cowlitz.

The Salmon River of Idaho, slashing with white-capped fangs through a mile-deep canyon, is appropriately named. In its mountain headquarters spawn some 65 percent of the valuable spring Chinook salmon of the whole Columbia Basin. It is a wilderness river—fenced off from pollution, chemical wastes and filth by countless miles of timbered solitudes. Lewis and Clark would not be disappointed if they saw the Salmon again. But below the confluence of the Salmon and Snake Rivers is a prodigious waterpower site, Nez Perce. In the present stage of knowledge regarding fish passage over high dams, any bill in Congress proposing Federal construction of a towering 730-foot dam at Nez Perce would provoke a nationwide struggle of the proportions of that fought over Echo Park in the Dinosaur National Monument.

But what if the FPC licensed Nez Perce for construction either by private utilities or publicly owned systems? Unlike Congress, the FPC is rarely responsive to public opinion.

And is this possibility so farfetched? In 1956 the FPC held extended hearings on certain license requests in the Snake River region. At these hearings, this testimony was given by Sam Hutchinson, regional director of the Bureau of Commercial Fisheries of the Fish and Wildlife Service:

"Nez Perce Dam would present an obstacle to fish passage of the major part of the Snake River run of anadromous fish. These fish are of such value that their very existence should not be jeopardized by placing reliance upon undesigned and untried fish facilities."

Yet, Sam Hutchinson might have been trying to speak above the roar of Snake River Rapids for all that he was listened to by the FPC. Concluded the Commission, "There is nothing in this record which convinces us that the Nez Perce project could not be constructed under a license issued pursuant to the provisions of the Federal Power Act."

II

The FPC has shown by its whole performance that it is not interested in fish and game. It is interested in licensing the pouring of concrete, whether by private utilities or public bodies. Through the efforts of the Izaak Walton League and other conservation groups, the Coordination Act has been beneficially amended to assure greater safeguarding of wildlife at Federal river projects. But of what value is this assurance at Federal dams if dams sanctioned by the FPC can be built, willy-nilly, regardless of what happens to fisheries? It is like bolting the front door but taking even the hinges off the back door.

The claim has been voiced that the Secretary of the Interior might abuse his prerogative, if he were authorized by law to voice the objection of the Fish and Wildlife Service to FPC projects which imperiled fish. I refuse to believe this of men of the caliber of Oscar L. Chapman and Fred Seaton, who have occupied this position during recent years. Furthermore, is the Secretary of the Interior any less to be trusted than the Secretary of the Army, who has long been allowed to block FPC dams threatening navigation? Are salmon runs of so little national importance compared with tug-and-barge schedules? Navigation is essential. So are fisheries.

III

Protection of salmon and trout at FPC projects today is a "no man's land," with responsibility vested in nobody—not even the licensee building the dam. We have just witnessed a tragic example of this at the Brownlee and Oxbow projects of the Idaho Power Co., in the Hells Canyon reach of the Snake River, as reported in recent issues of Outdoor America.

Salmon-trapping facilities at Oxbow were erected on unsound foundations, which collapsed at the crucial moment for the fish run. No professional fishery biologist was in charge despite the important values at stake. The company received several warnings from conservation agencies that fish migrations of substantial size were en route upstream to the construction sites.

What happened? According to a factual report prepared by experts of the Fish and Wildlife Service, at least 4,000 adult Chinook salmon and steelhead trout perished because of the "failure of the trapping facilities at Oxbow Dam." In addition, some 50 percent of the 14,000 salmon which were collected at Brownlee Dam and transported around the project "did not survive to spawn." And the Fish and Wildlife Service has stated cryptically, "The success of the 3,700 steelhead trout which were passed remains to be determined."

I should like to repeat here the grim summary contained in the Fish and Wildlife Service report:

"Reasons for the fish loss are many, but predominant among them are—lack of experienced salmon men at the project, failure to anticipate the action of the fish when the flows were reduced, and the large number of fish migrating upstream to spawn at the time of the shutdown.

"The fishery agencies believe these losses could have been avoided, and that there is little justification for sacrificing this valuable living fish resource to a desire to expedite, without compelling reason, the hydroelectric power development of the project."

Despite this havoc and destruction of an irreplaceable fisheries supply, the Federal bureau charged with safeguarding this resource could only stand by and wring its hands in anguish. It had no jurisdiction over FPC licensees. It could remonstrate but it could not order, it could suggest but it could not command. And the result was the heavy loss of migrating species which the Fish and Wildlife Service has listed.

These salmon and steelhead had struggled all the way to Oxbow and Brownlee from the sea—650 distant miles away. They had surmounted the concrete fish ladders at the low-level Bonneville, The Dalles, McNary and Ice Harbor Dams—built at a cost of many millions of dollars by American taxpayers and power-users. These fish carried with them upstream a heavy cargo of eggs and milt, to propagate the next generation. But they could not survive the indifference to their fate which was manifested jointly by the FPC and the utility company building Brownlee and Oxbow.

IV

It is natural to blame the FPC and each power interest, public or private, which destroys multiple use values under an FPC license. Until a better framework of law can be provided, such adverse public opinion is a legitimate weapon. But far more important is the correction of the basic cause. That would be more helpful than criticism.

Had my proposed amendment to the Federal Power Commission Act been in effect, the fiasco in the Hells Canyon stretch of the Snake could have been avoided. To begin with, the Federal Power Commission never would have had the authority to license the Brownlee and Oxbow Dams until facilities and equipment for the safe passage of migratory fish had been provided to the satisfaction of the Fish and Wildlife Service. Under such circumstances, Idaho Power Co. would have been obligated to heed warnings issued by the fisheries experts of the Service.

Left to its own inclinations and existing law, FPC undoubtedly will license the Nez Perce Dam, despite its ruinous impact on the salmon runs of the Salmon River watershed. This could even have disastrous international complications. Canada has made a $250,000 study of the possibility of diverting 15 million acre-feet of water out of the upper Columbia and into the Fraser River system. This water then might be impounded with a series of large dams on the Fraser, which flows all the way to the Pacific Ocean in Canada. But we of the United States have been opposing such a scheme on the grounds that it could cause the destruction of the great Sockeye salmon runs of the Fraser, which have been built back into a $50 million annual industry with fish ladders constructed around landslide areas at Hell's Gate.

But if the FPC permits Americans to construct Nez Perce, in spite of its adverse impact on the Chinook runs of the Salmon River, how can we in good conscience urge our Canadian friends never to block off the Sockeye runs of the Fraser River? Would the Canadians place any trust in us if we advocate a course of conduct for them which we do not subscribe to ourselves?

V

Actually, one of the ideal locations for further production of waterpower in the Northwest is along the swift surges of the upper Columbia. Dr. Ira N. Gabrielson, president of the Wildlife Management Institute, has described this as a "fishless river" because it was barricaded from the sea two decades ago by the lofty parapet of Grand Coulee. Canada and our own country, jointly, could produce millions of low-cost kilowatts in this area without doing damage to anadromous salmon and trout. I watched the upper Columbia salmon runs being relocated, with tank trucks and hatcheries, to tributaries such as the Wenatchee. Entiat, and Methow Rivers—all of which join the main stem of the Columbia downstream from Grand Coulee.

This is one reason why I have been holding Interior subcommittee hearings, in an effort to break the stalemate between Canada and the United States. Then, projects might be constructed like Libby and Mica Creek, which would generate vast quantities of power without retarding any fish on their upstream journey to the spawning grounds.

I have served in the Senate since January of 1955. This experience has convinced me that Congress would be extremely reluctant to authorize for Federal construction any projects doing severe damage to migratory salmon and trout pilgrimages. Public opinion always receives a hearing in Congress. But the FPC is antiseptically screened off from pressure by the American public, which explains why it so often disregards the pleas and protests of conservationists. This makes imperative some collateral jurisdiction for the Fish and Wildlife Services over FPC licenses on rivers where significant aquatic life exists.

I do not seek to leave the impression that my bill is the entire answer to the problems facing our migratory fisheries—far from it. Extensive research must be carried on with respect to the untested skimmer device. Is it the answer to safe detour for tiny fingerlings downstream past the roaring spillways and grinding turbines of high dams? Al Day, able director of the Oregon State Fish Commission and former director of the Fish and Wildlife Service, has told me that infinitely more investigation must be undertaken with respect to our smaller coastal streams and the opportunity they might offer for the transplanting of salmon runs which now thrash all the way to remote alpine headwaters. Unfortunately the administration budget for fiscal 1960 is not especially encouraging so far as further fisheries research is concerned. As in so many other situations, human health and defense weapons, for example, basic research is a main hope for enabling us to fathom the riddle of migratory fish and how they can survive civilization's crushing impact.

When I was a boy a whole capillary system of rivers offered hospitality to spawning fish that were home from the ocean. Now, only a few isolated threads remain on the map where salmon and steelhead can find the last, lingering creekbeds far back in the remote mountains. I want to help save these sanctuaries. When they are blocked off or desecrated, they will be difficult to replace. They must be preserved for the descendants of those salmon that the first westbound white men saw. That is the purpose of my bill. Such a cause presents a major challenge to an organization with the ideals and policies of the Izaak Walton League of America.

(NOTE.—Senator NEUBERGER is a member of the Portland chapter of the Izaak Walton League and has been an effective champion of conservation in the U.S. Senate. The Senator, a member of the Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission, was recently presented the 1958 distinguished service award of the League's Oregon Division for his successful sponsorship of the bill to save the pine forests and waterfowl marshes of the Klamath Indian Reservation.)

WHAT FPC-WILDLIFE BILL COULD ACCOMPLISH

(By J. W. Penfold)

Senator NEUBERGER illustrates the need for full consideration of fish and wildlife resources in Federal licensing of water-development projects through the dramatic example of the great salmon and steelhead resources of the Columbia Basin. His proposal to assure genuine partnership for fish and wildlife has immediate application throughout the United States where the Federal Power Commission must consider license applications. For example, proposed dams on the Connecticut River could have serious implications for migrating shad. A dam proposed above the existing Roanoke Rapids Dam (North Carolina and Virginia), by changing riverflow below, might create a serious problem for striped bass.

Hydropower projects inevitably affect fish, wildlife, and recreation values. The effects are not necessarily extensive nor detrimental. Frequently they can be beneficial, particularly if project features are designed and operations planned with such objectives in mind.

It is not likely that the review by the Secretary of the Interior of FPC licenses (as provided in the bill) would lead to many Interior objections. Careful scrutiny of all, however, would usually result in agreement with FPC on conditions of the FPC license issued, giving fish and wildlife reasonable consideration within the prime objectives of the project.

Existing law simply provides no reliable means for protecting fish and wildlife values in FPC licensing procedures—power is the Commission's specialty. The problem might be approached by requiring the FPC to add fish and wildlife to its prime responsibilities, but the more logical way is to place that responsibility—with reasonable authority—in the hands of the Interior Department, which is already charged by law with migratory-fish protection. Thus, the Neuberger proposal satisfies the multiple-use ideal of Izaak Walton League conservation policy by correcting the original error of allowing a single-use power dominance over other legitimate uses of our rivers.

THE BERLIN CRISIS AND THE PATH TO PEACE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, over the weekend, at New Rochelle, N.Y., I was privileged to address the Westchester County Democratic Committee dinner on the subject "The Berlin Crisis and the Path to Peace." The speech was not rendered in a partisan vein. It was what I hope my colleagues will find it to be, upon their reading and reflection a constructive and formal analysis of the foreign policy difficulties which we face and of the challenge of the crisis at Berlin to our national security and to the North Atlantic Treaty Alliance. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BERLIN CRISIS AND THE PATH TO PEACE

(Address by Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, Westchester County Democratic Committee dinner, Glen Island Casino, New Rochelle, N.Y., Saturday, April 11, 1959)

We now look back on 10 years of cooperation within the NATO alliance, and we look forward to the rapidly advancing climax of the Berlin crisis.

These two—NATO and Berlin—are closely linked together.

The first Berlin crisis of 1948–49 brought the NATO community into being.

The present Berlin crisis tests whether that unique community of nations, conceived in common danger and dedicated to common security, can long endure.

FIRMNESS BEFORE THE SOVIET THREAT

We have learned from hard experience to be firm before the Soviet threat.

We learned much in Greece and Turkey in 1947. And what we learned we put into action when Congress endorsed President Truman's now famous doctrine.

"It must be the policy of the United States," said President Truman 12 years ago, "to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation."

We learned the hard way in Czechoslovakia in 1948 when the Communists overthrew a free government. Then came the blockade of West Berlin. We were threatened. But by now we had learned well that those who do not stand firm will not remain free. We did not withdraw from the beleagured city. For 9 months free Berlin was sustained by an allied air bridge built of ingenuity and daring.

The lessons learned in Czechoslovakia and Berlin made their impact. Joining hands with the free nations of Europe, we created an unprecedented international community. NATO was established in 1949, just 10 years ago. Twelve nations—augmented by three more which joined later, pledged that an armed attack against one shall be considered an attack against them all.

The community of nations comprising NATO is the core of the Western World. If this community stands firm and united in the cause of freedom and justice, we shall prevail. If it collapses, we shall be in mortal danger.

The Soviets once more are threatening freedom in Berlin. They are probing to see whether that unique and indispensable community which is NATO can indeed endure.

Last November I stood in West Berlin with its able and courageous mayor, Willy Brandt. I vowed then, and I vow today, to support a policy of firmness, to uphold the right of France, Britain, and the United States to maintain garrisons in West Berlin until a legitimate peace treaty is signed.

This is the position and policy of our Government. It is also the position and policy of NATO. We will not surrender. We will not be pushed out.

But firmness before the Soviet threat, though indispensable, is not enough. Firmness alone will not preserve NATO, nor assure the survival of free Berlin.

Our firmness must be matched by our imagination and our willingness to negotiate.

Standing firm and a willingness to negotiate are not, as some suggest, contradictory policies. They are the two elements in any viable policy in the Berlin crisis. We can negotiate successfully only if we are prepared to stand firm. And we can command the political support necessary to a posture of firmness only if our negotiating position is clear, consistent, and realistic.

We may be grateful that this also is the position and the policy of our Government and of NATO. We will stand firm. And we will negotiate.

THE REQUIREMENTS OF NEGOTIATION

It is about negotiation that I want to talk with you for a few minutes tonight. I have frequently said that we must be willing to talk to the Rusians wherever and whenever there seems even the faintest hope of advancing the interests of peace and security.

Remember that we negotiated with the Russians on Austria for 10 years. Finally we got a treaty.

Remember that we negotiated with the Communists on Korea for 2 years. In the end we got a cease-fire.

For months we have been negotiating in Geneva on the cessation of nuclear tests. So far, there is no agreement. But we must go on negotiating.

This is what I had in mind when, on March 26, I introduced on the floor of the Senate a resolution which reads in part as follows:

"Resolved that the Senate support the efforts of the United States to continue to negotiate for an international agreement for the suspension of nuclear weapons tests and that it emphatically endorse the principle that an adequate inspection and control system must be a part of any such international agreement."

There is no alternative. We must negotiate on Berlin, on Germany, and on the general question of Eureopan security. We must go to the summit, and more than once if that is necessary.

I do not propose to talk tonight about the specific elements of our negotiating position in the forthcoming meetings of the Foreign Ministers of East and West. It would be both presumptuous and indelicate for a member of the legislative branch to speak of such affairs at the very moment that that position is being hammered out by the statesmen of the Western Powers.

But if I do not talk about the specifics, it is appropriate—in fact it is an obligation on all of us—to speak about the broad requirements of a viable negotiating position.

There has been much loose talk about Munich—about the dangers of being taken in by the Russians at the negotiating table.

I do not need to tell this audience that Berlin is not Munich.

To negotiate is not to appease. But we must understand very clearly what makes the difference between legitimate negotiation and inexcusable appeasement. Three requirements must be fulfilled if we are to come to the negotiating table prepared to seek reasonable adjustments without fear of succumbing to unreasonable demands. First, there must be unity of policy within the Western community. Second, we must be militarily prepared. Third, our people must understand the full gravity of the situation we confront. I want to ask you to think with me tonight about each of these requirements.

1. THE UNITY OF THE WESTERN COMMUNITY

First, the critical importance of unity. At Munich the democracies were not united. They were divided. The United States lived in the never-never land of isolationism. The low countries of Europe were neutrals. Britain and France were united, it is true—united in somnambulant apathy, anxious to believe the false promises of the dictators.

Happily, the situation is very different today. Yet there remains much to be done. We have achieved agreement on what we will not do.

We will not get out of Berlin, just because the Russians threaten us.

But negative agreement on what we will not do must now be transmuted into positive agreement on what we will do—what we will propose, what we will be prepared to give in return for what benefits.

This is our problem and our challenge.

The Western community is composed of free partners. The unity we seek must now be forged from the free give and take among partners in a common enterprise.

We must meet the demand for firmness on the part of nations most exposed to the Soviets—principally the Germans.

We must reconcile this demand for firmness with the opposing demand for flexibility on the part of other nations less exposed—principally the British.

We must understand the French desire for national prestige.

We must remain sensitive to German resistance to policies that appear to demand greater sacrifice of German interests than they do of the interests of the other partners.

We must never forget that all these points of view are legitimate.

The British, through their capable Prime Minister, Mr. Macmillan, demonstrate what we mean when we say that one can explore imaginatively and negotiate constructively while yet remaining firm.

The French, through their dedicated leader General DeGaulle, remind us that the unity we seek must be open enough to honor a genuine sense of national destiny.

The Germans, through the firm leadership of Chancellor Adenauer—who after so many years of invaluable service soon will leave the world of active politics—embody the vital quality of resoluteness.

Some people are distressed about the differences of view among the allies of the Western community. But the free discussion of our differences is a measure of our strength, and not our weakness.

The weak cannot expose their differences without exposing their weakness. So they conceal their differences—and remain weak. I am confident that in the process of reviewing and reconciling our differences we will emerge even stronger.

To achieve a united position among free and diverse people demands the utmost in good faith and consultative skill. But I am confident that we will achieve it.

It is quite possible that some of our present differences are the price we must pay for past negligence. We have tended to be fitful, not constant, in our consultations within the Western community. If we had worked a bit closer with our allies and strengthened the consultative process within NATO during the past 5 years, the task of achieving unity would be less difficult today.

Be that as it may, let us now accept the present crisis as an invaluable opportunity to foritify the unity of the Western community of nations. Without that unity, peace, and justice surely will not for long endure.

If unity is essential for NATO, it is also essential within the United States. It has never been more important than it is today for the administration to consult with the opposition party and to establish the closest possible working relationship with Congress. Our delegation to the coming Foreign Ministers Conference ought surely to include Senator WILLIAM FULBRIGHT, the respected chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, ranking Republican member of that committee.

Finally, we should not ignore the importance of achieving unity and support beyond the confines of the NATO community. The United Nations may play a significant role at this point. Let's not hesitate, at the appropriate time, to place our case before this unique international body. The United Nations cannot solve our problems for us. It was never meant to be a substitute for the difficult foreign policy decisions all governments must make. But it does present many opportunities for the execution of a responsible foreign policy. And no objective is more important than that of mobilizing the support of the many nations that share our concern for security and justice.

2. MILITARY PREPAREDNESS

The first general requirement for a responsible negotiating position is, then, unity. The second requirement is military preparedness. At Munich, the democracies were unprepared. They had to buy time to rearm. They bought time—with the only currency acceptable to the dictators, appeasement.

Military preparedness is vital. As Carl Sandburg once observed, "the cockroach is always wrong when it argues with the chicken." The militarily weak always invite appeasement when they negotiate with the militarily strong.

Once again, our present situation is happily very different from that of the democratic leaders who confronted the Fascists at Munich 21 years ago. Yet there is little cause for complacency. We must put to work immediately the lessons of the Berlin crisis. For this crisis throws a bright light on our military position and shows us that there is much yet to be done.

Last weekend, before the 10th anniversary celebration of the NATO Council, President Eisenhower reviewed the military posture of the Western community. He fortified his optimism with Scripture. "When a strong man armed keepeth his palace," quoted the President, "his goods are in peace." But Mr. Eisenhower neglected to complete the quotation which continues, "But when a stronger than he shall come to him, and overcome him, he taketh from him all his armor wherein he trusted and divideth his spoils."

I would suggest that we indulge less in self-congratulation and more in self-examination—and if necessary in self-sacrifice.

Many thoughtful men have been engaged in this critical self-examination. Many of them have concluded that our Defense Establishment is rapidly becoming inadequate in terms of the threat we face. If we allow our armor to become weak we may well suffer the fate of the improvident man of the Scriptural story. It is time we faced resolutely some searching questions.

Are we militarily prepared in relative terms, relative, that is, to present and foreseeable Soviet capabilities? And are we militarily prepared in relevant terms, relevant, that is, to the various military contingencies we may have to face?

Is our strategic force adequate—relative to the Soviets? General Power, head of the Strategic Air Command, said the other day: "I think our deterrent posture is deteriorating." The fact is that unless action is taken now we are going to find ourselves facing the Soviets with an old weapons system, we with our manned bombers, and they with long range missiles.

Is our Military Establishment relevant to the kind of threats we may have to deal with? The fact is that unless action is taken now we will run the risk of shortchanging our forces in weapons appropriate to their job. Gen. Lauris Norstad, commander of the North Atlantic Treaty forces, has asked for a new weapons system for NATO. His request has been given vigorous support by the President's distinguished Committee, headed by Mr. William Draper, and commissioned to evaluate our military aid program.

The increase in military assistance is to be primarily for new weapons in the NATO area.

The military balance of terror between East and West is a horrible thing. But this horror is exceeded only by the prospect of an imbalance of terror, an imbalance favoring the Communists. For them the cockroach would indeed find himself arguing with the chicken. To negotiate from military weakness is to invite appeasement.

If the Western community of nations is to endure, we must do what is necessary to maintain military parity with the Soviets—and do it now.

3. PUBLIC UNDERSTANDING

The third general requirement for a responsible negotiating position is public understanding. The appeasement of Munich was partly the product of popular misunderstanding. Most people thought that Czechoslovakia was a small, remote country, hardly worth bothering about—certainly not worth fighting over.

In a democracy, responsible policy cannot long maintain itself in times of crisis when the public is misinformed—or even when it is uninformed.

Again our situation today is happily very different from that of Munich. A recent New York Times survey of American opinion reveals serious concern about Berlin. The American people surely are not basically opposed to a responsible policy in the Berlin crisis.

But the Times survey also flashed some danger signals. Thirty-nine percent of the people interviewed did not understand the basic strategic problem we confront in defending free Berlin—the fact that it is located over 100 miles inside of Communist Europe. Right here in the New York area the percentage of uninformed people ran as high as 75 percent. Just as serious, most people were certain that the crisis would pass—that the danger was not great.

I do not believe we are at the brink of war. I too am confident we can contain this crisis. But we shall successfully avoid war and discharge our responsibilities to the people of West Berlin only if we understand the full complexity and precariousness of our situation.

It is not enough that our diplomats understand the problem. Our capacity to cope with the danger we now confront will not depend alone on the wisdom of statesmen meeting in Washington, London, Rome, Paris, and Bonn. It will rest finally on the understanding of the people from whom the statesmen draw their power.

Why do I say this? It is because people who have not been given the facts may tend to expect too much, or may mistake legitimate negotiation for appeasement. People who do not know the facts—who do not know, for example, the complexity of the problems we face—may demand what is impossible. They may demand or expect a permanent European settlement with the Russians.

People who have not been fully informed—who do not know, how precarious our situation is—may shout "Munich" if our diplomats begin talking about limited agreements with the Soviets aimed at easing tensions.

It is my firm belief that the administration has not done a good enough job of informing the public in the interests of greater understanding. Now, what specifically are the ingredients of this understanding?

First, we must be openminded and imaginative. We must understand that negotiated agreements designed to reduce the hazards of war are not appeasement unless they alter the status quo to our disadvantage.

Second, we must be patient. We must understand that nothing will be solved overnight; that settlements will, in fact, take years; and that we face a long road of uncertainty and insecurity.

Third, we must be resolute and willing to sacrifice. We must be willing to spend money—hard-earned money—to do what is necessary to maintain the strength of the Western community of nations.

The requirements of the present crisis are high. I came here tonight to speak about Berlin and the prerequisites of effective negotiation. I cannot leave without reminding you that the imagination, patience, and resoluteness which, as a people, we must now demonstrate is necessary at every level in our contest with the Soviets, in aid, in trade, and in appeals to the minds and souls of men, and at every point in our contest with the Communist bloc, in Asia, in the Middle East, in Africa, at the U.N.

WE ARE CALLED TO GREATNESS

I think I understand well the Communist threat. I have talked to Khrushchev. I have seen at firsthand his vigor, his determination, his ruthlessness. I know the power of totalitarian might. We must never underestimate this massive threat.

More to be feared than Soviet hardness is our own softness.

More to be feared than ruthless Soviet purpose is our aimlessness.

More to be feared than the pernicious appeal of Communist slogans to the disinherited of this earth is our own inability to develop a clear sense of purpose and to give mankind a vision of a noble destiny.

I do not believe the pessimists who say that as a people we Americans cannot or will not meet the demands of the present trial of Western civilization.

I do not propose that we chastise the American people.

I propose that we challenge them.

The measure of our responsibility is such that we must act with greatness. No people have ever risen to greatness without being called to greatness.

The tragedy of these years is that the voice that should summon us is silent.

PORT FACILITIES OF DULUTH, MINN.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, as a result of the great St. Lawrence Seaway, Duluth is destined to become one of the busiest and most important ports in the world.

Duluth will, by May 1, be ready to accommodate ocean vessels, and with the opening of the Seaway this summer it will serve as a vital link in bringing American and foreign shipping lines into the very heartland of America.

The fine facilities of the port of Duluth were recently presented by the Governor of Minnesota, Orville L. Freeman, to shipping lines in New York City. The Governor's excellent presentation was reported in the Christian Science Monitor of March 24, 1959. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DULUTH PORT BOOMED AS GATEWAY TO WEST

(By Harry C. Kenney)

NEW YORK.—Orville L. Freeman, Governor of Minnesota, came into New York recently to impress upon American and foreign shipping lines that the St. Lawrence Seaway will open a vast new highway to the great West through Duluth.

He said that in addition to its celebrated natural advantages, the Duluth port will offer facilities that are equal or superior to any others in the world. These will include a $10 million public terminal, plus a projected private terminal estimated at $80 million.

The Governor said that suddenly the seacoast is 1,500 miles closer. "That's how it seems to the manufacturers and processors in the hitherto landlocked region lying within the trade area of the seaport of Duluth."

SUPERPORT FACILITIES

On May 1, the Duluth port, serving a trade area of 540,000 square miles and more than 8 million persons, will be ready to accommodate ocean vessels (4 at one time) at a modern terminal equal or superior to other Great Lakes ports.

Governor Freeman, at the beginning of his remarks at a press conference at the Park Lane Hotel, emphasized that the Seaway is a new broad highway to world peace—from Duluth in the heartland of this continent to the major ports of the world.

There was little question but that the Governor and his 14-man delegation were here to convince as many shippers as possible that it might be less costly and more favorable to use their facilities than those of New York, New Orleans, Baltimore, Philadelphia, or even Chicago, and Milwaukee.

The people of Minnesota are putting great importance on the Seaway, and their Governor's presence here emphasizes the Duluth facilities.

FULL PROMOTION

The Governor's assistants were the first team of promoters. They were loaded with facts, figures, and statistics. They had charts and photographs. They were loaded with strategy on the potential volume of trade in the port's area and that "it stands in the very center of the food-producing area of the country."

The Governor stressed that opening of the Seaway will place Duluth at the head of the important waterway which will reach into the very heart of the North American Continent.

There were remarks at the press conference that Duluth would not eat into the port of New York activities; that the bulk of the area's foreign trade now moves by way of the gulf coast and very little is shipped by way of New York.

Robert T. Smith, director of the Duluth Port, said the port's future was not based upon diversion from other ports but rather in the hopes of an entirely new market developed from the enormous world trade potential in the Midwest.

COMPETITION SPURRED

There seems to be in the offing sharp competition among individual ports of the Great Lakes. Probably the king-sized prize will be the huge traffic potential of Minneapolis and St. Paul.

On this point, Prof. Ed Nightingale, of the University of Minnesota, said: "Nobody would think of moving Twin Cities foreign trade through Chicago or Milwaukee, if shippers could be assured of equal sailing at Duluth."

The Governor declared that he was impressed and pleased by expressions of sincere interest by the people in the maritime industry. He also was impressed by the pointed and specific questions asked dealing with pier availability, harbor drafts, labor supply, and rentals.

He said the Duluth authority has conducted surveys of general export-import cargo potential, not only for the 11-State area that the port will serve in the United States, but ranging as far as Canada and the west coast.

These surveys indicate a 350,000-ton annual average—92-plus percent export, 7-plus import. Minnesota alone has 352 shippers moving nearly 240,000 tons annually in foreign trade. It is expected that the export-import balance will improve with the advent of oceangoing ship traffic to Duluth.

Imports which should and will move through Duluth include coffee, cane sugar, glass and granite, automobiles, machinery, jute, burlap, and liquors.

MORIBUND WORLD COURT

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Moribund World Court," which appeared in the April 1 edition of the Washington Post and Times Herald.

The editorial points out the need for the Senate to take the lead in revitalizing the International Court of Justice by removing the reserve clause from its resolution of 1946 which accepted the Court's jurisdiction. I have recently introduced Senate Resolution 94 implementing this suggestion, so I should like to call this sound editorial statement to the attention of the Senate.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORIBUND WORLD COURT

Many of the American judges struggling to keep up with their congested calendars must look wistfully at the leisurely pace of the International Court of Justice while the World Court justices surely wish they had more to do. The Court has been neglected by most nations since it was set up in 1945. So it is encouraging to know that both Secretary of State Dulles and Attorney General Rogers have urged countries to make more use of the international tribunal.

The United States should take the lead in reviving the International Court because the Senate is largely responsible for the failure of countries to make use of the Court in settling international disputes. When the Senate passed a resolution in 1946 accepting the authority of the Court, an amendment was attached giving the United States the right to decide whether a case involving this country came within the Court's jurisdiction. This bad American example has been followed by many other countries with the result that few international disputes have been referred to the Court.

President Eisenhower ought to urge the Senate to repeal this restriction on the Court's power. If the International Court is ever to realize its potential as a constructive force for peace it ought to have considerable power to decide whether a case comes within its jurisdiction. During its first decade the Court has exhibited no power-grabbing tendencies and there is no reason to believe that the distinguished jurists who have been appointed to the Court by the U.N. Security Council and General Assembly would usurp the authority of domestic courts.

LABOR UNION REFORM

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, from time to time as the articles have come to my office, I have placed in the RECORD the comments, editorially and in story form, concerning the efforts being made by the Senate to pass a so-called labor reform bill.

On this subject, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled "Is Congress Bypassing Effective Labor Laws?" published in the Small Business Bulletin, of the National Small Business Men's Association, for March 1959; and an article entitled "Our Labor Legislation Muddle: What Action Should Investors Take Now?" published in the Investors League Bulletin of March 1959.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Small Business Bulletin, March 1959]

IS CONGRESS BYPASSING EFFECTIVE LABOR LAWS?

Outcome of momentous behind-the-scenes maneuvering now going on in Washington may spell doom to any labor legislation this year which would effectively help small business.

While public attention remains rooted on Senator JOHN KENNEDY's—Democrat of Massachusetts—unusually hurried attempts to ram through Congress a mild anticorruption bill, insiders privately tell us hope is dim for laws to outlaw secondary boycotts and coercive picketing—two of the most potent weapons of corrupt or unethical union leaders—and the hoodlum element now infesting labor leadership.

This despite obvious public demand that union corruption be cleaned up through stronger labor legislation.

Essentially, KENNEDY's bill would hit at union corruption and racketeering by compelling both unions and management to make public certain financial records and labor-management dealings—particularly relating to bargaining for union representation.

But several labor sweeteners also are included—proposed changes in the Taft-Hartley law which would be highly favorable to labor. Among other things, they would legalize existing—but outlawed—representation practices of the building trade unions, allow strikers replaced because of economic reasons to vote in representation elections.

Yet needed curbs on organizational picketing and secondary boycotts—which many, including the administration, know are just as important in stopping union corruption—are missing from the bill. And attempts to add them in committee have met overwhelming defeat.

Now, a trend toward compromise is developing, your staff finds, in certain congressional quarters. Both the labor sweeteners and picketing-boycott proposals would be deferred until later. Then a new attempt would be made to overhaul Taft-Hartley.

Through this move, a simple anticorruption reporting and disclosures bill should be passable. But the AFL–CIO says "No."

Give us the changes we demand in the Taft-Hartley law and give them to us now or we'll use our tremendous influence to kill the whole bill. This, in effect, is the ultimatum George Meany has hurled at Congress. Its connotation?

Complete disregard for public opinion. For this very union in 1958 pronounced these reforms good, and needed, to help unions put their house in order.

To put added teeth in this ultimatum and just before KENNEDY's bill hits the Senate floor 3,500 building and construction trades delegates have been brought to Washington. At Bulletin press time, these men representing all States were up on Capitol Hill relating labor's story to their Congressmen and Senators.

FLOOR FIGHT COMING?

With little or no chance of amending the Kennedy bill in Senate committee, your legislative staff foresees a real floor fight in the offing and the first real chance to determine unions' extent of influence in the Senate after November's elections.

Here, attempts will be made to either: (1) Add provisions covering secondary boycotts and picketing; or (2) remove the labor sweeteners.

The probability? KENNEDY'S bill, from what we can learn, will be passed with some modifications and with the sweeteners removed. The fight for these changes will be led by Senators BARRY GOLDWATER, Republican, of Arizona, and JOHN MCCLELLAN, Democrat, of Arkansas, whose Senate select committee has exposed the startling corruption and misuse of office now prevalent in many unions.

But while attention has focused on Senate action, two additional important labor reform measures have quietly been dropped in the House hopper by House Labor Committee Chairman GRAHAM BARDEN, Democrat, of North Carolina. One is similar to MCCLELLAN'S Senate proposal.

Wisely separating union reporting and disclosure measures from major Taft-Hartley changes, BARDEN'S bills should be the basis for House action on labor reform.

A labor bill of rights—that's what BARDEN calls his reporting measure, saying, "it would restore to the workers the right to control the affairs of their unions * * * and wrest control of these unions from the gangsters, hoodlums, and racketeers."

In essence, here's what this bill would do: Prohibit use of union funds for political purposes, require secret union membership vote before any strike, regulate union disciplinary procedures against members, provide members with the legal right to sue their union, require democratic safeguards in union constitutions, impose fiduciary responsibility upon union officials.

His other bill would outlaw recognition and organizations picketing, give States jurisdiction over labor disputes not handled by government, eliminate existing secondary boycott loopholes in Taft-Hartley.

BARDEN'S proposals loom important since—regardless of Senate action—the House seems sure of writing its own labor bill. And instead of considering only testimony already heard by MCCLELLAN'S committee, the House unit, we're told, will hold its own hearings on labor management reform needs.

While the eventual result of congressional action may be a modified Kennedy bill it's no longer a cinch to be rammed thru before anyone can catch his breath.

And the chance for small business to realize effective labor reform legislation as needed protection from today's big unions, from what we can see, lies in the House.

PLAN HOUSE ACTION

That's where your association is concentrating its efforts making sure that the House committee hears first-hand testimony on the need for reform laws.

Many Congressmen already have told us they realize the plight of small-business men. But they emphasize an immediate, urgent need for examples from small firms of unions' power abuse.

If you want just labor laws, help your cause best by acting now. Write your Congressman a letter relating any personal experiences you or your friends may have encountered. Send a carbon to us.

Only an immediate real response from small business can win this fight.

OUR LABOR LEGISLATION MUDDLE: WHAT ACTION SHOULD INVESTORS TAKE NOW?

We have repeatedly stated "Most people don't write their U.S. Senators and Representatives because they don't know just what to say and when to say it." Never has this remark been more appropriate than it is at this moment when important labor reform legislation is in the making. Our citizens who recognize the grave need of such legislation are confused and bewildered by the complexities of the various important labor measures which have been introduced in this session of Congress and on which public hearings before important congressional committees are now being held. All of them seem to taste good on the outside. But what really lies behind their sugar-coated surface?

The important work of the McClellan committee has brought into sharp focus the racketeering and arrogant dishonesty indulged in by certain bosses of some of our largest labor unions. This has aroused the public who demand a remedy to the intolerable conditions which now exist.

The political power of the labor czars was proven in the last congressional election and has instilled political fear in the minds of influential policymakers of both major political parties. They apparently feel that efforts to deal forthrightly with the evils that have been exposed may mark them for political extinction come 1960.

Investors well realize that the economic policies advanced by the AFL–CIO are definitely socialistic in character, are aimed at the destruction of saving and investment incentives through vicious taxation in behalf of promoting an all-powerful Government in Washington dedicated to wild-eyed Federal spending schemes to be paid for, if at all, in an inflated and debased currency. The crude, bare-faced philosophy of existence of many labor leaders may be capsuled in a few words: "Let's get ours today, and to hell with what happens tomorrow."

To fight this menance of the labor dictators the Investors League has consistently advocated legislation that would destroy this corrupt and ahorrently un-American and fascist dictatorship at its very roots rather than to temporize with ineffective and wishy-washy pretenses of mere regulation. We surely would never advocate regulated robbery, or regulated arson and violence.

Our basic legislative recommendations for ridding the Nation of the causes of labor union abuses have been to put unions under the antitrust laws, guarantee the right of every individual to join or not to join a union as a condition of employment, and ban unions from engaging in political activities with their members' dues. The several major labor bills pending before this Congress duck these issues with one exception. (The Barden and McClellan bills do contain provisions outlawing misuse of union funds in political activities.)

THREE MAJOR BILLS BEFORE CONGRESS

S. 505. The Kennedy-Ervin bill: This is by far the weakest and most ineffective pretence of remedial legislation as witnessed by its endorsement by the AFL–CIO. It has been roundly denounced before the Senate Subcommittee on Labor. Godfrey P. Schmidt, for instance, one of the three court-appointed monitors named to clean up the Teamsters Union, made the following comment on S. 505, "One of the most rampant abuses of power in the labor movement * * * is the practice of visiting reprisals upon union members and officers who dare to exercise free speech in opposition to the wishes or programs of powerful labor leaders. * * * Your bill (S. 505) would, I think, be unacceptable and inefficient precisely because it fails to take care of this most important abuse." Schmidt also stated his talks with workers convinced him that "no labor reform can be effectuated unless recognition and organizational picketing is banned. Your (Senator KENNEDY'S) prohibition of blackmail picketing is completely inadequate." Schmidt also said "Since the irresponsible power of labor leaders needs curbing, secondary boycotts, which is a source of this power, must be limited. I think provisions in this respect should be incorporated in your bill." Other serious defects in S. 505 include a provision to permit nonemployees to vote in NLRB elections and one to change the term "supervisor" as presently defined in Taft-Hartley in such manner that the door would be open to union domination of thousands of supervisors who are now considered a part of management.

No labor bill at all would be preferable to S. 505. It would simply strengthen the hand of the labor dictators by lulling the public into the false belief that constructive labor legislation had been enacted and pave the way for later demands for more dangerous amendments to Taft-Hartley such as elimination of the right-to-work provisions.

S. 748, the administration bill: This bill was introduced with the approval of Labor Secretary Mitchell by Senator GOLDWATER and 14 of his cosponsoring colleagues. This bill deals largely with requiring disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of unions and their officers and agents, election and removal of officers and other such matters. In these respects the provisions are more thoroughly defined than in the Kennedy-Ervin bill.

Unlike the Kennedy-Ervin bill, S. 748 contains provisions for materially strengthening laws against secondary boycotts and picketing. This administration bill contains no provisions against union political activities. While it is by far preferable to S. 505, it still leaves much to be desired. From a practical political standpoint, however, in view of the fact that it has the endorsement of the administration and the Secretary of Labor, and in view of the general attitudes of the Members of this Congress toward labor legislation, it is probably the best that can be hoped for at this time.

H.R. 4474, the Barden bill: This bill resembles the administration bill in many respects but contains some tougher provisions such as one to prohibit use of union dues for political activities, which the unions will fight tooth and nail. Senator MCCLELLAN has introduced S. 1134 which more or less parallels the provisions of H.R. 4474 except that as of the date of this Bulletin he had not yet introduced a bill dealing with amendments of the NLRA and LMRA. Desirable as these bills are, it is quite doubtful that they could gain the endorsement of the Secretary of Labor, to say nothing of the labor-liberal majority Members of the present Congress.

WHAT SHOULD INVESTORS DO?

This is no time merely to do nothing. This would only help get the wrong labor bill enacted. We would normally, as a matter of principle, urge support of the Barden and McClellan bills. From a practical political standpoint, however, it might be more effective if we were to write Senator MCCLELLAN and urge him to help defeat the Kennedy-Ervin bill and support the administration bill, leaving for a later date consideration of legislation banning the use of union dues for political purposes and other needed amendments to Taft-Hartley. Your president has written Senator MCCLELLAN such a letter which is reproduced on the back page.

THE NEED FOR SALK VACCINE SHOTS

Mr. HART. Mr. President, yesterday was the 4th anniversary of the dramatic announcement made at the University of Michigan that at last the Nation had in its possession a highly effective method with which to fight paralytic poliomyelitis. Yet 4 years later less than half of our population has received one shot. That leaves about 77 million men, women, and children who have not taken advantage of this most essential means of self-help.

The New York Times on yesterday, April 12, published an article which I can only hope those who have not taken advantage of the Salk vaccine will read.

As the parent of a child who was stricken with paralytic polio the summer before the Salk vaccine came on the market, I only wish I could find the word formula which would induce all parents, and the rest of the population, as well, to insure themselves against attack by taking advantage of this wonderful vaccine.

We approach the summer vacation time with happy contemplation. Nonetheless, we realize there are some things which are dangerous and cannot be avoided—the other fellow's driving on the highways and the unpredictable weather on the water. But polio is a disease which is traditionally associated with summer weather and about which we can now do something. We owe it to our families and ourselves to do what we should.

In Michigan, it has been found that the group which is the hardest to reach are the preschool children, the group at home. Only 43 percent of such children, too young to do anything about this themselves, have been given the opportunity to receive one shot.

I know we are all reading about the wonderful one-mixture vaccine which it is hoped will immunize against many diseases. But let us not wait for that to come on the market in great quantities, because the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has informed State agencies that a mass supply may not be on the market for some time. That agency also has stressed that it is better to have everyone receive the three shots of the Salk vaccine before worrying about those who have not had the fourth shot. The department urges, finally, that the three shots be received in the period before the end of June, even though this means receiving the shots closer together than is normally recommended.

Again, I wish I could find the formula in words which would induce everyone in the Nation to insure himself against the hideous aftermath of an infection which now can be avoided, thanks to Dr. Salk, whom Congress honored so deservedly a year or so ago.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article entitled "Need for Salk Shots," written by Howard A. Rusk, M.D., published in the New York Times of April 12, 1959, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 12, 1959]

NEED FOR SALK SHOTS—STUDY OF HOW MOST IN U.S. LACK THEM AND A PLEA FOR IMMEDIATE VACCINATION

(By Howard A. Rusk, M.D.)

Four years ago today the world rejoiced at the dramatic announcement made at the University of Michigan that at last a safe and effective vaccine against paralytic poliomyelitis was available. The vaccine, of course, was that developed by Dr. Jonas E. Salk of the University of Pittsburgh.

But now, 4 years later, less than half (77 million) of the Nation's population has had even one dose of Salk vaccine. Almost 98 million men, women, and children have not taken advantage of one of the most important medical developments of our time.

During the first half of the century there was a steady increase in the incidence of polio in the United States, with a peak of almost 58,000 cases in 1952. With the introduction of Salk vaccine, the incidence dropped sharply. In 1957, there were but 5,500 cases and less than half of these (2,500) were paralytic.

But in 1958 the number started to rise again. Provisional figures indicate that polio struck 6,000 persons, including 3,100 paralytic cases. More than half of these paralytic cases occurred in children under 5 years old. Needless epidemics killed and crippled victims in Michigan, New Jersey, Montana, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia and Hawaii.

In the Detroit epidemic, 95 percent of the paralytic cases occurred among persons who were unvaccinated or incompletely vaccinated and 61 percent of these cases were among infants and children under 5.

Why did polio increase in 1958? The answer is simple. In 1958 only half as much vaccine was distributed for domestic use as in 1957.

What will happen this year? Preliminary figures indicate that 1959 will be worse than 1958 unless those who have not had the full three doses of Salk vaccine start their immunization program immediately.

The U.S. Public Health Service reports that during the first 12 weeks of this year there were 187 reported cases of paralytic polio, compared with 103 during the same period of 1958.

Since the vaccine program has been administered through the schools in many areas, the percentage of school-age children who have been vaccinated is higher than in any other group.

Two age groups highly susceptible to polio and in which only a low percentage have been vaccinated are preschool children and young adults between 20 and 30 years old.

The U.S. Public Health Service has recently approved a 4-in-1 vaccine to protect preschool children against polio, diphtheria pertussis, and tetanus. This new multiple antigen vaccine will reduce the immunization course for the four diseases from six to four injections.

Older persons however, should not overlook the importance of vaccination. Two years ago this month, James Wood, of Charlotte, Mich., a 36-year-old father of 7 children, was struck by paralytic polio and had to be placed in a respirator. Mr. Wood had taken care to see that his 7 children ranging from 2 to 13 years old had received the full 3 doses of vaccine. But, he himself had been "too busy to bother."

Dr. Herman E. Hilleboe, State Commissioner of Health and Dr. Leo Gibson, president of the Medical Society of the State of New York, urged all physicians in the State to emphasize the importance of polio vaccination. They suggested that physicians should ask all persons under 40 coming to their offices for any reason if they had been vaccinated.

In the opinion of this writer, all persons under 60 should take the full set of Salk vaccine shots. Last year he saw 3 persons who had been struck with paralytic polio past the age of 60.

In their bulletin, Dr. Hilleboe and Dr. Gibson also recommended a fourth dose of Salk vaccine. Dr. Salk in January reported that a fourth dose of a selected lot of commercial vaccine resulted in the appearance of antibodies in the blood of a group of children who had failed to develop detectable circulating antibodies against one or more types of polio virus after three doses of vaccine.

Most important, however, is to get all persons vaccinated.

Intensive research is under way toward the development of new and more potent vaccines. Field tests of an attenuated live-virus vaccine are being made. It is to be hoped these efforts will be successful. But the presently available Salk vaccine, when 3 doses are taken, is at least 80 percent effective.

Last week the professional advisory committees of the National Foundation met to lay plans for the new March of Dimes attack on the other 62 known viruses and on juvenile arthritis and congenital malformations.

All of these authorities agreed that despite the importance of these new programs, the highest priority must be given to inducing all who have not had the full three doses of Salk vaccine to begin their series of innoculations at once. The time for action is now.

SENATOR MANSFIELD OF MONTANA

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from a very fine newspaper, the Washington Evening Star, for whose editorials I think all Members of Congress have high regard. The editorial to which I refer relates to the distinguished majority whip, MIKE MANSFIELD. The editorial appeared in the Washington Star of yesterday. I think all of us agree there is no finer and abler servant in public life today than MIKE MANSFIELD. I should like to have all my colleagues and all those who read the RECORD see the fine comments expressed by the Evening Star concerning MIKE MANSFIELD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THINKING MAN'S APPEAL

It is a good thing to have a man like MIKE MANSFIELD around at a time when too many people are enthralled or intimidated by catchwords and cliches. It is good because this Montana Senator thinks for himself and says what he thinks.

There is a cult in our country which is preaching the doctrine that it is futile to negotiate with Mr. Khrushchev because the Russians have never lived up to an agreement. And by implication this cult charges that anyone who disagrees is either an appeaser or a halfwit.

Senator MANSFIELD has not hesitated to disagree—his most recent effort being a speech last week to the Alumni Association of New York University Law School. What he says makes sense to us.

The Montana Democrat appealed for an affirmative approach by the West to the forthcoming session of Foreign Ministers and the prospective summit meeting. There should be less concern, he said, with saving face and more with saving civilization. Senator MANSFIELD was not born yesterday, and he definitely is not a peace-at-any-price advocate. He insists that any agreement must be based on a quid pro quo, on concessions to match concessions. And, of course, he realizes that there will be no peace, and no settlement, unless the Russians want a peaceful settlement.

He argues, however, that there have been great changes in the world in 15 years—great changes especially in Europe and in Germany. These changes bear down upon the Russians no less than upon the West, and they call for rethinking in order to be sure that our tactics have not become frozen in obsolete concepts. In short, Senator MANSFIELD is saying essentially what Mr. Macmillan has been saying, as we understand it. And this is that policies devised years ago, in another setting, cannot serve in the new situation which is evolving.

In short, we must raise our sights and try again. Let's ignore the namecallers and the defeatists. It is at least possible that the Russians, for reasons of their own, want a settlement which the West can accept. If this is the case, the opportunity should not be muffed because of shackled thinking. For the alternative is war—a nuclear war which will dump mankind into a black and bottomless pit. This, in essence, is Senator MANSFIELD's message. We hope he will continue to speak his piece.

PRESENTATION OF MEDAL TO ADMIRAL RICKOVER

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, announcement was made a day or two ago that a medal would be presented to Admiral Rickover on Wednesday, April 15, the ceremony of presentation to be held in the auditorium of the New Senate Office Building.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the announcement by the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, together with the text of the joint resolution authorizing the medal be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the announcement and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RICKOVER MEDAL PRESENTATION

A special gold medal, authorized by the Congress last year, will be presented to Vice Adm. Hyman G. Rickover at a public ceremony on Wednesday, April 15, Senator CLINTON P. ANDERSON, chairman, and Representative CARL T. DURHAM, vice chairman, of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, announced today.

The ceremony, to be part of a public session of the Joint Committee, will be held in the auditorium of the New Senate Office Building and is scheduled to start at 2:30 p.m. Senator ANDERSON, as chairman, will make the presentation on behalf of Congress as provided by the law.

Congress authorized the medal last year in a joint resolution introduced by Senator ANDERSON, Congressman DURHAM, and a number of their colleagues. The resolution was approved unanimously in both Houses of Congress and was signed into law by President Eisenhower on August 28, 1958.

Congress stated in the resolution that the medal was to be awarded in recognition of Admiral Rickover's work in directing the development and construction of the world's first nuclear-powered ships and the first large-scale nuclear power reactor devoted exclusively to the production of electricity. Admiral Rickover is known as the "Father" of the nuclear submarine fleet including the Nautilus, the Skate, and the Skipjack.

Invited to participate in the ceremony are Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON, House Speaker SAM RAYBURN, Senate Majority Leader LYNDON JOHNSON, Senate Minority Leader EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, House Majority Leader JOHN MCCORMACK, House Minority Leader CHARLES HALLECK, Chairmen CLARENCE CANNON and CARL HAYDEN of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees, and Chairmen CARL VINSON and RICHARD B. RUSSELL of the House and Senate Armed Services Committees.

At the presentation ceremony next week, Admiral Rickover will give his annual report on the status of the naval reactor program and the Shippingport, Pa., civilian power reactor project, the Nation's first nuclear power station to go into operation. Committee members and other Members of Congress participating in the ceremony will be given an opportunity to comment on the accomplishments of the program.

The award of the medal by Chairman ANDERSON will follow. Senator ANDERSON also will present Admiral Rickover with a special copy of the joint resolution of the Congress, and a resolution signed by all members of the Joint Committee expressing their appreciation to him for his contribution to America's technological progress.

All Members of Congress and a number of officials of the executive branch of government have been invited to attend the ceremony. These officials include Secretary of Defense Neil McElroy, Under Secretary of Defense Donald Quarles, AEC Chairman John McCone and members of the Atomic Energy Commission, Navy Secretary Thomas S. Gates, Jr., Presidential Assistant James C. Hagerty, and Capt. E. P. Aurand, USN, President Eisenhower's naval aide.

The public is cordially invited to attend the ceremony, Senator ANDERSON and Congressman DURHAM stated.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 201

Joint resolution to authorize the chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy to confer a medal on Rear Adm. Hyman George Rickover, United States Navy

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in recognition of the achievements of Rear Admiral Hyman George Rickover, United States Navy, in successfully directing the development and construction of the world's first nuclear-powered ships and the first large-scale nuclear power reactor devoted exclusively to production of electricity, the Chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, on behalf of the Congress, is authorized to present to Admiral Hyman George Rickover, United States Navy, an appropriate gold medal for such purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to cause to be struck a gold medal with suitable emblems, devices, and inscriptions to be determined by the Secretary and Chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $2,500 for this purpose.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause duplicates in bronze of such medal to be coined and sold, under such regulations as he may prescribe, at a price sufficient to cover the cost thereof (including labor), and the appropriations used for carrying out the provisions of this section shall be reimbursed out of the proceeds of such sale.

PERFORMANCE RECORDS OF SUBMARINE "SKIPJACK"

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, several members of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy have enjoyed a memorable trip on the submarine Skipjack. On the trip, the submarine went to a greater depth than any other submarine has ever descended before and moved at a greater speed than any other submarine has previously traveled. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RDCORD a press release issued by the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy upon the return of the congressional party to the mainland.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Two new performance records of the USS submarine Skipjack were announced today by Senator CLINTON P. ANDERSON, chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, upon his return from an overnight trip on the submarine with six other committee members and Vice Adm. H. G. Rickover, USN.

Senator ANDERSON stated: "While underway and submerged, the Joint Committee held an official committee meeting, during which time the Skipjack was going faster and deeper than any known submarine in history. For security reasons, I can only say that we were deeper than 400 feet and moving faster than 20 knots. In 1955 some of us also traveled on the Nautilus and we were impressed today by the many technical advances and substantial increases in performance that have been achieved in Skipjack, including speed, maneuverability, and endurance."

In addition to Chairman ANDERSON, the following committee members were abroad: Senators JOHN O. PASTORE, Rhode Island; HENRY M. JACKSON, Washington; GEORGE D. AIKEN, Vermont; Congressman CHET HOLIFIELD, California; JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, Pennsylvania; and JACK WESTLAND, Washington.

During the record breaking trip, the committee members and staff were given a thorough tour of the new submarine, and participated in high speed maneuvers.

At the underwater hearing held in Skipjack's wardroom, Admiral Rickover gave a presentation on the accomplishments of the Skipjack and new developments in the naval reactors program. In response to questions, the Admiral explained the safety features of the reactor design and operation of the Skipjack.

The committee members stated that the Electric Boat Co. and other participating industrial companies deserved congratulations for a job well done.

Senator ANDERSON, on behalf of the congressional committee, thanked Cmdr. William W. Behrens, Jr., USN, the commanding officer of the Skipjack, for the hospitality extended by him, his officers and crew, and for the expert way they put Skipjack through its paces.

In closing, Senator ANDERSON said: "We are impressed with the tremendous advancements that have been made in the 4 short years that have transpired since the first atomic submarine went to sea.

"The country and all our citizens can be proud of Admiral Rickover and his fine team for achieving for the United States technological leadership in the field of nuclear ship propulsion. The committee, on behalf of the Congress, will recognize these accomplishments at its forthcoming public ceremony, Wednesday, April 15, 1959, when we will present to Admiral Rickover the special congressional medal authorized by Congress last year."

The committee and Admiral Rickover were accompanied by Capt. E. P. Wilkinson, USN, Commander Submarine Division 102; Carleton Shugg, vice president, General Dynamics Corp., Electric Boat Division; and James T. Ramey, executive director of the Joint Committee staff.

HYDROPOWER AND THE BUREAU OF RECLAMATION—ADDRESS BY COMMISSIONER W. A. DEXHEIMER

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, the basic problem of far-western America is a sufficient supply of water in order to make it possible to cope with the fast increasing population and the rapidly burgeoning economy of the States located there. I doubt that any Federal policy adopted during the last half century has been more beneficent to the development of western America than the Federal policy of reclamation.

During most of the era of the Eisenhower administration the Commissioner of Reclamation has been Mr. W. A. Dexheimer, who retired only a few days ago. On the 1st of this month, Commissioner Dexheimer spoke on "Hydropower and the Bureau of Reclamation," at the American Power Conference, at the Sherman Hotel, in Chicago, Ill. He indicated how the Department of the Interior has, during the last half century, followed the guidelines laid down by the Congress of the United States in constructing reclamation projects in the West, many of them multipurpose in character.

The hydroelectric energy generated as an incident to multipurpose Federal construction has been necessary on most occasions to demonstrate the economic feasibility of the Federal undertakings. Costs of commercial power and of water for municipal and industrial purposes under Federal law are repaid with interest. Costs allocated to the supplying of water for irrigation purposes are repaid without interest.

Mr. President, as I have stated, the Federal reclamation policy, established under the administration of Theodore Roosevelt, and continued by the legislation enacted by the Congress down to date, has been of great benefit to the country, and most particularly to the semiarid Western States.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the complete text of Commissioner Dexheimer's excellent and timely speech.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HYDROPOWER AND THE BUREAU OF RECLAMATION

(Paper presented by Commissioner of Reclamation W. A. Dexheimer, at the American Power Conference, Sherman Hotel, Chicago, Ill., April 1, 1959)

I am pleased to discuss the hydroelectric program of the Bureau of Reclamation with you today, particularly because it gives me an opportunity to put power generation in its proper perspective as it relates to our statutory responsibilities.

Our primary job is the conservation and utilization of water for consumptive purposes, principally irrigation, in the semiarid West, generally defined as the 17 Western States. Secretary of the Interior Seaton, who sends his greetings to this conference, recognizes the importance of water conservation in our future and has supported our efforts to further this work.

In the semiarid West, water is and has always been the key to survival. Storage facilities are necessary to conserve the erratic spring runoff of melting snow water for use later in the hot, summer season when the western river flows drop sharply or, in some instances dry up completely.

In recent decades, seasonal regulation has been expanded to become cyclical storage because of wide variations in annual flows. We have borrowed from Joseph's dream of Biblical days to store water in days and years of plenty to carry through periods of drought and want.

Hydroelectric-power generation has been a natural byproduct of storage dams and reservoirs necessary for this water conservation. I am sure no one would dispute the wisdom of also harnessing and using this tremendous source of energy. It would be a criminal waste of one of our most valued resources to do otherwise.

The Department of the Interior is responsible for the marketing of all energy generated by federally constructed plants except the Tennessee Valley Authority.

In these two Federal Government functions—installation of power facilities and marketing—competition exists, and hence they are subjects of debate and conflict. However, it is important to remember that the Secretary of the Interior, as well as we in the agencies under his direction, are carrying out responsibilities placed upon us by the Congress. We are governed by a broad framework of laws and policies laid down by the Congress in all phases of water resource work, including development and marketing of hydropower. These include the preference of municipalities and REA in purchase of power.

It is against this background that I have prepared this discussion on Bureau of Reclamation hydro operations and their relation to our total program.

Federal reclamation was first authorized in the Reclamation Act signed into law by President Theodore Roosevelt in 1902. One of the first irrigation projects to be undertaken was the Salt River project in Arizona, and it was on this project that the first Federal reclamation hydropower was generated. A small plant, of 15,400 kilowatts, was built as an initial part of Roosevelt Dam to supply energy for the manufacture of cement.

From this beginning, hydropower facilities have grown concurrently with other phases of our water conservation until we are currently operating 40 plants scattered through the Western States and Alaska. The installed nameplate capacity is 5,110,175 kilowatts. This represents roughly 18 percent of the installed hydro capacity in the United States and 4 percent of the world capacity.

Bureau of Reclamation power generation is entirely hydroelectric, with no steam generation whatever. It should be noted also that we specifically do not attempt or profess to supply the entire power needs of any area. We are primarily a water resource development agency and not a utility for power supply.

Within the statutory authority under which we operate, we seek the closest cooperation with the utilities in the area—be they municipal, cooperative, or investor owned—in order that the power supply we have available can be utilized to the greatest degree possible.

Bear in mind, however, that hydropower generation is low man on the totem pole so far as priority of use of water is concerned on reclamation projects. We are bound by 57 years of consistent policy and multiple Federal and State laws which establish priorities for the use of water in the semiarid West.

Generally, these statutes provide that domestic requirements have first call on the available supply of water. Beneficial consumptive uses, such as municipal and industrial consumption and irrigation, rank high followed by pollution abatement, salinity control, flood control, and navigation. Usually all are ahead of requirements for hydropower generation.

Water conservation for consumptive use has been and is today the most important problem facing the Western United States. As you are probably well aware, it is also a subject that is gaining in importance elsewhere in the United States as our population grows and our water needs soar.

It is this intense competition for water that has brought to the fore the multiple-use concept of development. In many instances, water may be made to serve more than one master and a reclamation project can provide multiple benefits, including the generation of hydropower.

In most such instances, overriding primary benefits are much more important than power generation. Also, in many cases, a single-purpose power facility, such as a utility would be licensed to construct, would not be feasible. Thus, by combining these multiple water uses, the Federal project is providing benefits which could not be realized from any single-purpose endeavor.

Hydroelectric power has another very important function in the development of the water resources of the West, particularly irrigation. This is the part it plays in the financing of the overall project.

The Reclamation program is unique among federally financed activities in that the invested capital is repaid into the Treasury. Ninety-three percent of the money the Bureau of Reclamation spends is repaid to the United States by the project beneficiaries.

Costs of commercial power and of water for municipal and industrial purposes are repaid with interest. Costs allocated to the supplying of water for irrigation purposes are repaid without interest.

This interest-free concept goes back to the reclamation fund which was established by Congress at the time the Reclamation Act of 1902 was passed. Accretions to the fund come not from the taxpayer's pocket but from the sale of public lands, royalties from land leasing for some minerals, and from revenue from reclamation projects. This fund comprises approximately 44 percent of our annual appropriation at the present time. Most of this fund is from the public lands of the Western States, and Congress obviously did not feel that the West should be charged interest for using its own money.

Many Western States today have more than 50 percent of their land area under Federal control. The reclamation investment is in the nature of a replacement for the depletion of western resources which provide revenue for the reclamation fund.

However, in this day of high competition for water and of high-cost construction to bring it to the user, most irrigators cannot carry the entire burden of repayment of irrigation costs. In many instances power revenues are used to pick up the balance of these costs, as well as repaying all power costs with interest.

Thus power becomes not only an important byproduct of multipurpose reclamation project construction; it also becomes a paying partner and makes possible many projects which would not otherwise be feasible.

As people who are interested primarily in power production you will ask: "Is this fair? Without carrying these added costs, could not power from Federal projects be marketed at a lower rate?"

Quite possibly, but consider two balancing factors. First, investor-owned utilities contribute to the upbuilding and general economic welfare of the areas they serve by substantial tax payments. Federal hydroplants built as a part of reclamation projects are tax free, but they contribute to repayment of and thereby make possible the total project, thus vastly improving the total economy of the area and of the Nation.

Secondly, as I have pointed out, in many instances a single-purpose hydropower plant may not be economically justified where a multipurpose project is entirely feasible. Certainly, in many instances, a substantial repayment by power to the cost of the total project is fair and reasonable—the local power consumer benefits both from water conservation and power.

Thus it is clearly demonstrable that hydropower is an integral and very essential part of multipurpose water resource development. Without it, the water users would be faced with an impossible repayment burden and the orderly process of development would be slowed to the danger point. By the same reasoning, without water conservation and use as primary functions of multipurpose reclamation development, projects would be cut back to single-purpose hydropower dams or not built at all.

In the West most of the feasible single-purpose hydropower sites have been used—large storage is essential to further feasible hydropower. Development of this vast segment of our Nation depends on water supply, for water is truly the lifeblood of the West. Its availability determines the ceiling of progress and expansion.

Many of you here today are from outside of the 17 Western States—the semiarid belt served by the Bureau of Reclamation. You can reasonably ask: "Is this so bad, to halt development and expansion at Government expense of a segment of the United States which may be increasingly in competition with me?"

I have already pointed out one answer—Federal reclamation is on a reimbursable basis. Only those expenditures which, as a matter of national policy, are not repayable are written off from our capital costs. They are 7 percent of the total and largely for flood control. The more important answer is the contribution the expanding western economy can make to the national welfare.

In the early days of American pioneering when the settlers pushed first past the Appalachians, then across the Mississippi and Missouri, fought their way across the high Rockies and on to the Pacific coast, the American economy was fed and prospered because of the wealth-creating productivity of new homes, new farms, new communities, new industries, as the frontier was pushed ever westward.

We have long since reached the Pacific and only this year have welcomed two new States into our Nation from the Pacific. There still remains a vast storehouse of natural resources in the semiarid reaches of the West not touched nor exploited in 100 years of the rush to the Pacific.

Water has been and is the key to the unlocking of this storehouse. There must be an assured supply of water for people in the cities and for industrial use. There must be water to keep the crops growing during the long, dry summers when rainfall is a rarity in most parts of the West.

There must be energy, too, to turn the wheels of industry and to supply the mounting per capita needs as well as the increases resulting from an increased population. Per capita uses of both water and power are shooting skyward. With the West experiencing the highest rate of population growth of any area of the Nation, a double problem is posed in keeping supply ahead of demand.

The Federal Government has an orderly program underway to assist the States and their local entities in development of the water resources. To the extent possible, hydropower development is incorporated in these plans. But, as I have stated, the Federal Government is not a utility, and we look to the utilities to accept the responsibility of keeping an adequate supply of kilowatts on the line.

Continued development of this vast semiarid segment of the United States is a natural sequel and, in a sense, a continuance of the pioneering that has been a stimulus to national trade and economy for almost two centuries. And it can continue to be a stimulus to the national welfare and prosperity.

As recently as 1955, the Second Hoover Commission had this to say about the Federal reclamation program:

"The justification for Federal interest in irrigation is not solely to provide land for farmers or to increase food supply. These new farm areas inevitably create villages and towns whose populations thrive from furnishing supplies to the farmer, marketing his crops and from the industries which grow around these areas.

"The economy of seven important cities of the West had its base in irrigation—Denver, Salt Lake City, Phoenix, Spokane, Boise, El Paso, Fresno, and Yakima. Indeed, these new centers of productivity send waves of economic improvement to the far borders, like a pebble thrown into a pond. Through irrigation, man has been able to build a stable civilization in an area that might otherwise have been open only to intermittent exploitation."

The Library of Congress, in a report on reclamation published only last January, takes further note of the importance of developing this interior area. I quote:

"Another newer value (of reclamation), apparently not truly envisioned a half century ago, appears highly important today. The settlement and development of our western area has provided us a key to power—not only uranium and other significant raw materials, but even more important—integrated and firmly held space.

"We are not an 'east of the mountains' country; we span the continent and have our feet firmly implanted on the shores of two great oceans. We are not a loose linking of marginal settlements—we have no dead never-never continental interior as does Australia."

I have just returned from a visit to Australia and a visit to the Snowy Mountains water conservation and hydroelectric project. That project represents Australia's great national effort to better utilize its very limited water resources. It is a long-range effort stretching over several decades and will, I am sure, bring that nation to a new high level of economic stability and opportunity for growth just as will our own continuing efforts in this country. Australia, with a land area nearly equal to that of the United States, has just reached 10 million in population. Their greatest problems are conservation of water and providing power for economic growth.

It is not generally realized but for every family on a reclamation farm, two families gain a living in the local area in produce handling, merchandising, shipping, other service functions, and in the professions.

But bear in mind that the wealth productivity of a reclamation project is not restricted to the immediate local area. Crops produced on reclamation projects last year had a gross value of a billion dollars. A large part of this money went into the purchase of tractors, other farm machinery and hard goods and shoes, clothes and staple groceries that came from the four corners of the Nation. It is on such trade and purchasing power that the Nation's industrial payrolls are built and fed.

What of the future? It is anticipated that there will be an additional 60 million people in the United States by 1975, bringing our national population up to more than 225 million. Of this increase, 11 Western States will have the largest total numerical gain and also by far the greatest percentage of growth of any major sectional area.

Couple this fact with anticipated increased water needs skyrocketing from 185 billion gallons a day in 1950 to 450 billion gallons by 1975 and you will understand the concern of all agencies dealing with water supply to meet this challenge of the future.

The Bureau of Reclamation has currently underway construction on dams which will provide about 38,170,000 acre-feet of storage space and projects which, upon completion, will provide water for 1,971,300 acres of land. Several projects have hydroelectric facilities as a part of multipurpose dam construction and we expect to add 2,367,950 kilowatts of capacity to Bureau constructed facilities by the time presently authorized projects are completed.

Many of these projects, such as the Colorado River storage project and its participating units, and the Missouri River Basin project, are long-range undertakings and will require several decades to complete.

In addition, we have on the planning boards many more projects. These will be submitted to Congress for possible authorization as the planning reports are completed and the need for them develops as it surely will in the face of a rising population and increased per capita water needs.

These projects of the future have several things in common. They will be costly in comparison to projects built in low-cost construction times of previous decades. Most of them will clearly need some repayment assistance beyond the ability of the irrigation water users. Many of them will require tremendous quantities of low-cost energy for irrigation pumping. Much of this energy will come from hydroelectric plants built as a part of basinwide development plans.

The important thing to remember is that power is of major importance in the future development of our water resources. We anticipate incorporating power facilities in any multipurpose project where they are economically feasible.

It may be well to consider for a moment the future of hydropower in competition with other forms of generation. There have been some rather ill-considered statements in recent years that hydropower is pricing itself out of the market in competition with modern, efficient high-pressure steamplants and the promise of nuclear development.

In the January issue of Power Engineering, Calvin B. Davis, president of the Harza Engineering Co., makes this observation:

"For the future I see a continuing development of hydropower for the United States and for most foreign countries. A few countries will approach full development and the remaining less economically attractive hydrosites will feel increased competition from thermo and nuclear sources.

"However, the complementary relationship between nuclear capacity and hydroelectric pumped storage capacity appears to bode well for the hydro industry for many years to come in the United States."

A few years ago, we asked the Atomic Energy Commission whether continued hydroelectric power development would be feasible and, if so, for how long in the light of potential nuclear power development. The answer was that any hydroelectric development which can be justified and is feasible today will be feasible throughout its useful life.

It seems to me that this conclusion has been reached generally in the industry because hydropower development today is increasing. The Federal Power Commission has before it a great number of applications for licensing of power projects at sites that, a few years ago, would have been far beyond the need or possibility of development by private investment capital.

The Federal Power Commission is faced with a critical decision on a number of these applications as to whether the best interests of total development are served by a single-purpose project or one in which multiple benefits may be incorporated. The Department of the Interior also has a responsibility in this regard because the Secretary is expected to comment to the Federal Power Commission on utility license applications and their relationship to maximum basinwide utilization of the water resources.

Essentially, I would like to sum up my remarks in this way:

1. The Bureau of Reclamation's primary responsibility is conservation and development of the water resources of the West by construction of projects which are largely self-liquidating.

2. Hydropower is a byproduct of multipurpose reclamation development, albeit a very important one from the standpoint of economic feasibility and for maximum utilization of the available water.

3. Congress has the ultimate determination as to the authorization of specific reclamation projects and how potential hydropower facilities shall be incorporated.

4. Long existing laws and congressional policies determine how energy from Federal facilities is marketed.

5. The need for conservation and maximum utilization of water and for added generation of energy from all sources becomes more critical every day.

6. The Federal Government has a vital and continuing interest and responsibility in water conservation as do the public utilities in meeting the Nation's power needs.

7. There is far more to de done in both fields than can be undertaken by any one agency or organization. It will require united and cooperative efforts to keep ahead of water and power needs.

Finally, this Nation's investment in conservation and use of our water supplies has proven its worth. Today's continuing effort in this field constitutes one of the most important programs currently underway for our economic growth and prosperity. It must be maintained at an orderly pace.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns today it stand in adjournment until Wednesday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the policy committee will meet tomorrow, and if the labor bill is ready to be taken up, and the reports and hearings are available, and the policy committee schedules it, I think we should start discussing it Wednesday. For that reason, the Senate, when it adjourns, will do so until Wednesday. I do not expect to have any votes on the amendments this week. There will be discussion of the bill. The leadership is prepared to have a Saturday session if Senators wish to discuss the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. With reference to having any votes this week, I am sure Senators will wish to know how to make plans. I wonder if the majority leader can assure us there will be no votes this week.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. So far as the majority leader is concerned, he will do everything he can to protect Senators from having to vote this week. We do expect the policy committee to schedule bills, such as the cotton-acreage bill. If the policy committee does schedule bills, we expect to bring them up before the week is over. But we do want general discussion on the labor bill if the policy committee schedules it. We will have sessions as long as there are Senators who wish to discuss it, including Saturday. We cannot make them discuss it, but we can provide an opportunity for them to discuss it. The Senate will be held in session so long as any Member asks for an opportunity to speak on the labor bill, but so far as the leadership is concerned, there will be no votes on the bill this week.

ORDER DISPENSING WITH CALL OF CALENDAR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the calendar under the rule be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

REPORT ON OPERATIONS UNDER INTERNATIONAL CULTURAL EXCHANGE AND TRADE FAIR PARTICIPATION ACT OF 1956--MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the provisions of Section 9 of Public Law 860 of the 84th Congress, I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the Fifth Semiannual Report of Operations under the International Cultural Exchange and Trade Fair Participation Act of 1956.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 13, 1959.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATION FOR III PAN AMERICAN GAMES

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 140, H.R. 2575.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 2575) to authorize the appropriation of $500,000 to be spent for the purpose of the III Pan American Games to be held in Chicago, Ill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS obtained the floor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield so that I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. With that understanding, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, when H.R. 2575 was called up on the Consent Calendar last Friday, I made a brief statement about its nature; but since an objection had been filed by a Member of the Senate, the subject, of course, was not pursued further.

I am very grateful to the leadership of the majority for calling this measure up today. I should like to take this opportunity to make a somewhat expanded, but I hope not too lengthy, statement on the measure.

The Pan American Games are scheduled to be held in Chicago from August 27, to September 7. It is hoped to attract some 2,000 athletes from all countries of the Americas, but primarily from Latin America south of the border and in the Caribbean area.

The House some time ago passed, by an overwhelming vote, the authorization for an appropriation of $500,000 for these games; and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, with only one dissenting vote, ordered a companion measure reported on the 25th of March. This is the measure now before the Senate.

A great deal of planning and work has gone into the preparations for these international games, and substantial sums have been authorized and spent locally. Private subscriptions of some $500,000 are now being made. The city of Chicago has itself committed itself to appropriations and expenditures amounting to approximately $2 million. Both the citizens, therefore, and the government of Chicago, are cooperating fully in expending large sums of money for the conduct of these games.

The prospects are therefore bright that we may be able to promote friendship between the countries of this hemisphere, provided this appropriation is made. The games will be participated in by some 2,000 contestants, who will represent Canada, the United States, South and Central America, and the islands of the Caribbean. Similar games were held in Buenos Aires in 1951, and in Mexico City in 1955. At the conclusion of the 1955 games in Mexico City, the holding of the 1959 games was awarded to the city of Cleveland. Two years afterward, the city of Cleveland withdrew as the host city, and it became necessary for the Pan American Games Association to seek another locale.

When we in Chicago witnessed the disappointment over the withdrawal of the host city from participation in the games, the Chicago City Council directed that an invitation be extended to the Pan American games officials to award the holding of the games to Chicago, to be held August 27 to September 7, 1959.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. First, let me say I am heartily in favor of the bill. I am glad it is before the Senate. I concur in what the distinguished Senator from Illinois has said about the merits of the bill. I shall support it, if I am present in the Chamber when the vote is taken.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the majority leader for the assurance of his support, and I wish to say he is an extremely good man to have on one's side.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. During the course of his comments on the bill, which I support fully, by the way, the Senator from Illinois mentioned that the bill was ordered reported to the Senate by the Foreign Relations Committee with one dissenting vote. I think, for the RECORD, it should be made very plain that, in comparison with the arrangements previously made when the games were scheduled to be held in another city, the financial arrangements with Chicago are superior, and will not cost the Government anywhere near the amount previously anticipated if the games were to be held in the other city. Is that correct?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct. I thank the Senator for emphasizing that fact. Congress appropriated $5 million to the city of Cleveland. The major portion of the funds was to be used for the construction of a stadium in the city of Cleveland, in which the games would be held. We are asking for an appropriation of only $500,000. None of this money is to go for the construction of any facilities. They will all be furnished by the city of Chicago. The funds are instead to be used solely for reimbursement for the expense of flying the contestants to Chicago, and for the partial maintenance of the athletes from outside the United States while they are in Chicago.

The participating countries will make an expenditure of $3 a day per individual for maintenance, but the actual cost will be between $8 and $10 a day. The residue of the $500,000 not needed for transportation is to go for the difference between this $3 and the actual cost. Any money not spent will be returned to the Treasury. The Comptroller General will be able to inspect all expenditures, to audit the accounts in full; and, if there are any questionable expenditures, they will be thrown out.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The statement just made is one of the points I wanted to bring to the Senate's attention, because it is quite possible that, even though $500,000 is being requested of the Congress, the refunds which will be made in the final summing up will result in the actual expenditures of a lesser amount.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope that will be true.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I think in all fairness it ought to be said that, had such an arrangement as was proposed by the city of Chicago been proposed by the city of Cleveland and been presented to the Congress for consideration, the result might well have been quite different. I think the RECORD should show this is quite different from the original proposal as it affected Cleveland, and that the individual interested in this matter at that time acted in good faith and with good reason.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Montana. I agree with the statement which he has just made.

It should be worthwhile to point out a supplementary safeguard which we have inserted in the pending bill; namely, that the Comptroller General is not only to make an audit of the expenditures, but that the expenditures themselves are to be subject to such control as he deems to be proper. So if the Comptroller General requires that the money be spent on vouchers only, it will be done in that manner. In other words, the items of expenditure for air transportation and for maintenance will be strictly under the control of the Comptroller General and not under the control of the local committees. This also is very different from the Cleveland proposal.

It is also worthy of note that in recent days the plans for transportation have been changed. It was originally contemplated that the military forces would be reimbursed for transportation furnished, and I so stated to the Senate Friday. The plans have now been changed, and it is now planned that the transportation will be provided by civilian planes, so that the rather humorous objection which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] made last Friday is now removed, and the Senator from Illinois cannot be accused of any inconsistency in opposing junkets conducted by the Air Force for which no reimbursement is made, and flights authorized by Congress for which full reimbursement is made. Now we will take the military completely out of the picture and the civilian airlines will be used on a commercial basis.

I think the example which Chicago has set can be copied and should be followed by the defense forces in respect to other matters.

Mr. LAUSCHE rose.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield to my dear friend, the senior Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Am I correct in my understanding that the original bill made a general grant of $500,000 to be used in whatever manner the developers of the program saw fit, and that the bill was subsequently changed so as to earmark the fund for two specific purposes; one being transportation, and the second being the maintenance of the athletes, in part, while they are in Chicago?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Ohio is correct. The bill specifically provides that the funds are for lodging, food, and transportation.

This is the result of both the financial punctiliousness of the city of Chicago and the very effective needling of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator very much. Secondly, the original bill contained no provision about the auditing of the accounts.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And that has been changed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is true.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have one final question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We began with the Cleveland bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But as we discovered more and more errors in the Cleveland bill we changed our bill accordingly.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does the Senator from Illinois think he is going to persuade me to vote for the bill by these concessions and by the bit of approbation he has given to the conduct of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope that I may, but I know the Senator from Ohio is very unpredictable and I am not certain I shall be successful in persuading him. I will quote some lines from Oliver Goldsmith, about hope:

The wretch condemn'd with life to part,
Still, still on hope relies,
And every pang that rends the heart,
Bids expectation rise.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Ohio hopes always to be definitely predictable when the issues before the Senate are decided on the basis of merit, but when the issues are not decided on the basis of merit but on the necessities of politics, and the Senator from Ohio becomes convinced that is the fact; in that event one can rest assured the Senator from Ohio will pass upon the issue in the manner which he thinks is proper.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think that is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have one final question. Is it possible that the city of Chicago will come back to the Congress for more money?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The answer is "no." We will not ask for 1 additional cent. And if we do not need the money authorized—we want to be thrifty in its expenditure—we will return it, and the bill so provides.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The $500,000 will be the limit to be asked?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is the absolute ceiling.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator very much. I commend the Senator from Illinois for the ardor he has exhibited in supporting the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope the Senator from Ohio will exhibit a true sense of proportion in this matter and will vote for the bill.

I say to my good friend that whereas Cleveland wanted the U.S. Government to build a stadium for them, which they would then inherit, the city of Chicago is not only furnishing Soldier Field, but it is building additional facilities at its own expense and at the expense of the Park District, which will run very much over a million dollars.

I should like to indicate some of the facilities which will be furnished. There is to be a swimming pool suitable for swimming, diving, and water polo, to cost $1 million, and to be covered by appropriations from the Park District. There is to be a new running track in Soldier Field, which will cost more than $100,000. There is to be a new cycling track at a cost of $40,000. There will be provided an adequate rowing course in the Cal-Sag Canal, requiring an expenditure of $20,000. Equipment, horses, and facilities will be furnished for the equestrian events and for the modern pentathlon at a cost of $35,000. A rifle and pistol range will be built at a cost of $100,000. A further expenditure will be made for special equipment, fencing, and gymnastics, $12,000.

Never has a city done so much for the Pan American games as the city of Chicago is going to do for these games. If Cleveland had only had the public spirit to do likewise and had not tried to take the Government for a buggy ride, Cleveland undoubtedly would have received the appropriation.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I am obliged to state that Cleveland went through an experience which frequently happens in ininstances of this type. When the program was submitted it was presented as one which would require no expenditures. Later it developed that $200,000 would be required. That $200,000 ultimately lifted itself, with the prospect of the State having to put up $2 million, the Federal Government having to put up $5 million, and the city of Cleveland having to put up $3 million, with private enterprises having to put up other amounts.

It was for that reason that I opposed the project; and it is for that reason that I asked the Senator from Illinois whether he contemplates coming back and asking for more money if the $500,000 is not adequate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. May my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, and may my right arm be withered if I do any such thing as that. I am sure that my colleague from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] will take a similar vow of abstinence.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As I have said, I am somewhat dubious as to whether the Olympic games breed international friendship, because frequently the competition between the big powers is so intense at those games that they stir up animosity rather than friendship. However, the Pan American games are of a different kind. They are between small powers and the United States and Canada. There is no basic ill will between any of the nations. They compete on the basis of merit and with fairplay and the best men winning. They should therefore breed friendship.

I think it is important that we realize that the interchange of persons and the building of friendship takes place not merely on the intellectual level, but also in the field of sports, and in the field of art.

The distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has inaugurated a great program of Fulbright scholarships and exchange of persons. This program is very valuable. But we want to build friendship on other levels as well. If sports are properly conducted, and not excessively competitive, they, too, can develop friendship.

I also point out that by private subscription we are also providing a festival of the arts and the music of the Americas. We wish to bring orchestras, writers, painters, and sculptors from Latin America, so that on the artistic side of life we may become better acquainted with one another's achievements and create a deeper understanding and friendship.

This is important, because the intellectuals of the Latin American countries are frequently inclined to deprecate American achievement in the arts and culture. This program will help to offset and overcome that unfortunate tendency.

Furthermore, we should remember that while these games are in progress in Chicago, a world youth congress will be in progress in Vienna, under Communist auspices. That World Youth Congress will have a great deal of support from the Communist countries. They are reaching out to attract visitors from other portions of the world including Latin America.

I believe that the Pan American games, and the Festival of the Americas, which will accompany it, can be used to help offset the drive of the Communists for intellectual relationships with Latin America. The Communists are already beginning to make a great drive in Latin America. It is very important that we should offset it. I think we are slowly coming to realize that friendships are built not so much by arms, not even solely by economic aid, but also in the world of sports, the world of artistic achievement, and the world of thought and philosophy.

So it is with a clear conscience that we submit this proposal, which we have tried to make economical, and yet sound.

The President of the United States has indicated his belief in the importance of the games by accepting the chairmanship of the Honorary Sponsoring Committee.

Because time is of the essence, if this appropriation is not authorized, it cannot be made; and if it is not made, then for the lack of $500,000 the Pan American games may fall through. This would be a great reflection upon this country, if, after the games had been awarded and scheduled, we were to say, "We do not have enough money to go through with it."

Mr. President, that completes all I have to say, unless the Senator from Ohio has further questions, which I shall be glad to try to answer.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I subscribe to the general statement made by the Senator from Illinois, that for the good of our country it is absolutely essential that there be carried on exchanges in cultural, athletic, business, and other fields. I am thoroughly in concurrence with him in that expression.

However, I have voiced my objection to this proposal, principally on the basis of the mode which has been established by various communities, of promoting the establishment of an international event in a particular area, and then coming to the Federal Government, after the deed has been agreed upon, asking for financial help.

I have in mind three instances in which that has been done. The first is the Cleveland instance, in which the representation was made to the city that the project would be self-sustaining. Before the program was ready to be submitted, it ran to a cost of between $11 million and $12 million of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let me say that we in Chicago pitch our programs on a more modest scale than that on which the good people of Cleveland operate. They are more expansive, and we are more restrained.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The basic wrong, however, existed also in the case of Chicago. It proceeded to drive the pegs for the establishment of the games, and then came to the Federal Government for financial aid.

The second instance I have in mind is that of the Squaw Valley International Olympics. In 1954, Reno, Nev., conceived the idea that it would be a great thing to have the winter olympics held in Squaw Valley. It emphasized the point that Reno wanted the International Olympics. They were to be held in the mountains of California, but Reno is about 40 miles away, and undoubtedly it felt that benefit would come to Reno in the event the Olympics were held there.

Two men by the name of Cushing and Poulsen had bought some land in Squaw Valley. They got together a group of men in 1948 and bought 574 acres of land in an area which was not at all developed. They put up a total of $400,000.

In 1954, when Cushing saw that Reno wanted the Olympics, he decided that he would interest himself, and he went to a legislator in California and said that it would cost about $2 million to provide the facilities for the winter Olympics. The State of California was persuaded to put up $1 million. I assume that the other $1 million was to be gathered in various ways, through private contributions, and possibly from the city of Reno. But $1 million was available, and the promoters then went to the international committee and persuaded the international committee to decide upon Squaw Valley as the place to hold the winter Olympics. I now quote what Cushing said to the committee. He did not expect to get it, but, he said: "We would plead poverty, poor mouth it all over the place. We would not try to compete with the rich European resorts, which would stage the games with Roman grandeur. Ours would be a healthy, unadorned game in a clean, simple atmosphere, free from commercial pressure and public interference."

That is the plea with which he went to the Committee on International Olympics. He said, "Come to the mountains of California, into Squaw Valley. We do not have the grandeur of the Romans, but here will be simple surroundings, with fresh air and simple facilities to accommodate you. We have no money to provide grandeur and richness of facilities."

The International Committee accepted that argument and decided to go to Squaw Valley.

Then they began to look around. They found that $1 million was not enough, and they went to the Legislature of California, and got the legislature to give them $4 million. Four million dollars was not enough. They then came to Congress and got $4 million from us. It is not now known whether the $8 million will be adequate to properly finance the project.

Cushing and the other promoters have $10 million in facilities which are being built in the Squaw Valley project. All types of facilities have been constructed. It now appears that the promoters are going to be in the midst of $14 million worth of public improvements from which they will enjoy the bonanza that will come in the future.

Squaw Valley went forward with the program. They did not come to Congress or the State Department to learn whether they would receive the money. They cast the die and then, when they were in distress, came to Congress for the financial aid which was needed. I might say that the Legislature of California finally threw up its hands and said, "We have given $4 million. We cannot give any more." The result was that last summer, I believe, Congress voted a $4 million appropriation for the promotion of these games.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Am I to understand that the Senator objects to the action of Congress in appropriating funds by which it will be possible for the winter Olympic games to be held at Squaw Valley?

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from California has not heard what I have said.

Mr. KUCHEL. That is one of my difficulties.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I said at the very beginning that in my opinion these international cultural, athletic, and scientific events inure to the benefit of our country. What I have in mind is that whenever the United States puts up the money to build arenas and stadiums, swimming facilities, ski lifts, dormitories, and sewer systems, and all the other facilities which are necessary, the opportunity to hold such games should be afforded available to every State that has facilities which could be used for that purpose. I have in mind the States of Washington, Oregon, California, Idaho, Maine, Vermont, Colorado, all States which have mountains and such facilities.

Mr. KUCHEL. Does the able Senator know under what circumstances an area of the State which I have the honor in part to represent was chosen for these Olympic games?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have on my desk an article which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of February 1958, and one which appeared in Time magazine of February 9, 1959. They show that the initial invitation came from Reno, Nev. Then a Mr. Cushing and a Mr. Poulsen saw the newspaper item in the San Francisco Chronicle, stating that Reno was inviting the Olympic games. Poulsen and Cushing, who own nearly 600 acres of land and a lodge in the area, felt that that would be grand for them. They undertook to develop the proposal that the games be held at Squaw Valley. The point I am trying to make is that if the United States is to put up money, every State which has facilities ought to be given an opportunity to bid on the project.

Mr. KUCHEL. If the news stories to which my friend refers are correct, I must say that in some ways they constitute a tribute to the forehandedness of some of my constituents in California. However I should like to ask my friend from Ohio, Who makes the decision to hold the Olympic games wherever they are going to be held?

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Committee on the International Olympics.

Mr. KUCHEL. Is the Senator from Ohio objecting to the manner in which that committee discharged its responsibilities in making its choice?

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Ohio is not objecting on that basis. The Time magazine report tells the story of the argument made to the committee and the quotation which I have given to the Senator from California.

Mr. KUCHEL. Does the Senator object to the moneys appropriated by Congress to underwrite the winter Olympics?

Mr. LAUSCHE. No, I do not object to that, but I object to the method which is adopted. Interested persons go to the taxpayers and say it will cost nothing. The cost then rises to $13 million. In the California project it was said it would not cost more than $2 million. That finally rose to a figure of $4 million for California and $4 million for the Federal Government. I am vigorously opposed to such techniques, which I see exhibited day after day.

Mr. KUCHEL. Let me ask my able friend this question: When he talks about the technique which was used and to which he is opposed, am I to understand he means that in the urging by the people of my State that the winter Olympics be held in their State anything wrong or unethical was done?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have nothing but the greatest respect for the people of California. They were not in unanimous agreement on the subject. They believed that it would cost only $2 million when they started out.

Mr. KUCHEL. Who are "they"? The people who wanted it?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I believe the California Legislature felt it would cost only $2 million. When they were asked for $4 million, I believe they honestly felt that amount would be enough.

Mr. KUCHEL. I apologize for coming into the Chamber late. I had a meeting to attend. I am always distressed to hear any of my colleagues take potshots at the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It is not a reflection on California. My discussion relates to the technique which is involved in these projects.

Mr. KUCHEL. How would the Senator explain that technique?

Mr. LAUSCHE. The technique is that the promoters—and this was not the State of California—submit a proposal which, they say, will involve no cost. Then by the time they get through it runs into millions of dollars.

Mr. KUCHEL. Does the Senator from Ohio suggest that any bad faith was attached to any of the estimates of cost in this instance?

Mr. LAUSCHE. The initial figures were made without an honest calculation. So far as the California proposition is concerned, in the case of transportation inexcusable mistakes were made until experts were called in to figure really what the cost would be. I am now talking of the promoters of the proposal, not the ones who ultimately undertook to finish it.

Mr. KUCHEL. When the International Olympics Committee decided to hold the Winter Olympics in Squaw Valley, Calif., would the Senator say they were misled in arriving at that decision?

Mr. LAUSCHE. No; they were glad to come to the United States; there is no question about that. I am glad the Olympics are to be held in California. What I desire is that in the approach to these matters there be some advance, careful calculation made, with a view to getting reliable figures of what the ultimate cost will be.

Mr. KUCHEL. I respect the able Senator from Ohio and the constructive purpose he seeks to serve in demonstrating that what is needed, on all levels of government spending is to consider most carefully the basis upon which appropriations are asked for. However, I think he and I, together with other Members of the Senate, unanimously agree that it is good for amicable relations between the people of the United States and the people of the rest of the world that the next Olympic contests will be held in this country. The fact that they will be held in one State rather than in another is simply an irrelevant fact.

It is on the same basis that I supported appropriate legislation for Squaw Valley, when it was before Congress that I look with favor on the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed at this point in the RECORD the text of articles relating to this subject published in the Saturday Evening Post of February 22, 1958, and Time magazine of February 9, 1959.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post, Feb. 22, 1958]

THE GREAT WINTER OLYMPICS FIGHT

(By Melvin Durslag)

The committee arranging the solemn closing ceremony of the 1956 winter Olympic games at Cortina d'Ampezza, Italy, was beset suddenly with panic. Olympic tradition calls for the mayor of the host city for the next games to sit among the dignitaries on the rostrum. But no such official was on hand from Squaw Valley, Calif., the site of the 1960 winter Olympics.

An excited Italian raced into the stands and tugged at the arm of John J. Garland, American member of the International Olympic Committee. "Come quickly," the Italian cried. Garland hurried to the rostrum and was pushed into the vacant chair. The ceremony proceeded and the 1956 winter games concluded, with no explanation being offered of why a stand-in was needed for the mayor of Squaw Valley.

Actually, it happens that Squaw Valley doesn't have a mayor. For that matter, it has no policemen, no post office, no gasoline station. It doesn't have much of anything except some strikingly scenic mountains, oceans of snow, and gobs of troubles.

Through a dazzling display of salesmanship by one of Squaw Valley's 30 registered voters the 1960 winter Olympics had been given to an area which doesn't appear on most maps. Indeed, except for a sprinkling of ardent ski enthusiasts who have discovered the pristine charm of Squaw Valley and tested its wondrous alpine slopes, there were few people even in California who had heard of it, let alone seen it.

Squaw Valley stretches only 3 miles long by a half mile wide. It is located in an obscure spot on the eastern side of the Sierras, adjacent to Lake Tahoe and 45 miles southwest of Reno, Nev. Squaw Valley is a place of quiet, simple beauty, but since the moment 3 years ago when it was picked by the International Olympic Committee as the scene of the 1960 winter games, it has been a whirlpool of strife and controversy.

The balloting had hardly concluded before a spokesman for Innsbruck, Austria, which finished second in the voting, hurled a charge of political connivance. A delegate from Saint-Moritz, Switzerland, which was also in the running, described the Squaw Valley bid as a cunning land-and-hotel scheme. Even Avery Brundage, of Chicago, the president of the International Olympic Committee, warned Squaw Valley that the wherewithal for staging the Olympics had better be forthcoming immediately, or he would recommend that its right to hold the games be forfeited.

Skiing and sledding groups joined the detractors. And to add to the complications, the principal landowner in the valley, some of whose property is needed for the games, refused to sell. A hot court battle is pending.

The bringing of the winter Olympics—and all attendant troubles—to Squaw Valley was accomplished by a nimble-witted promoter named Alexander Cushing, who has been called "a Mike Todd in snowshoes." On December 23, 1954, Cushing, then 41, sat reading the morning paper in his mountain home in Squaw Valley. A dispatch from the East put his memory machinery into motion. The U.S. Olympic Committee, he read, was hearing bids in New York City from various winter sports centers which were eager to become the American nominee as host for the 1960 winter Olympics. The more Cushing thought about it, the more he was convinced that the games belonged in Squaw Valley.

His enthusiasm wasn't dampened by the fact that Squaw Valley's facilities consisted of (a) 1 ski lift, (b) 2 rope tows and (c) 1 small lodge. Nor did he worry that the nearest place for groceries, aspirin, and mail was 7 miles away, at the village of Tahoe City. These were drawbacks, he felt, that could be easily surmounted.

More important in his view were the natural attributes of Squaw Valley, which he considered the finest in the world for winter sports. The flawless wind-free skiing and the clean, fresh air of the valley had enchanted Cushing at first sight, back in 1947. A socially prominent New Yorker, a Harvard graduate—by way of Groton—and a prominent attorney, he chucked his career in law and brought his wife and three children to Squaw Valley in order to enter, of all things, the ski-resort business.

He obtained 574 acres of land from Wayne Poulsen, a Pan American World Airways pilot, and Martin Arrouge, ski-instructor husband of former Actress Norma Shearer. Then Cushing built a lodge and ski lift with $400,000 he raised among his eastern friends. Laurance Rockefeller and John (Jock) McLean were among those who became major stockholders in 1948 in the newly formed Squaw Valley Development Co.

Now, in December of 1954, the problem at hand for Cushing, president of the development company, was how to realize his brainstorm of landing the 1960 winter Olympics. "I didn't know the first thing about procedure on this sort of matter," he says, "so I phoned the U.S. Olympic Committee in New York. The man I talked to finally told me to prepare a presentation, not exceeding 45 minutes, which the committee would hear at 8 a.m. on January 10. You can see I had to work fast."

Cushing began by getting the backing of Gov. Goodwin Knight and the U.S. Senators from California, THOMAS KUCHEL and William Knowland. "None of them thought I had a chance," says Cushing, "but they naturally couldn't go on record saying they were against the winter Olympics coming to California. All gave me an endorsement."

FIRST MILLION STATE

The next step was to get a promise of financial backing from the California Legislature. For this project, he enlisted the help of State Senator Harold T. Johnson, of Placer County, in which Squaw Valley is located. Cushing extolled the endless benefits that Placer County would reap from a winter Olympics. He assured the senator that the cost would be nominal. Johnson introduced a bill in the State legislature that would appropriate $1 million for the winter games—if Cushing should be able to bring them to California.

Thus armed, the one-man delegation from Squaw Valley was off for New York to make his pitch against such widely publicized contenders as Sun Valley, Idaho; Lake Placid, N.Y.; and Aspen, Colo. Other candidates included Reno, Nev., and Anchorage, Alaska.

Cushing is a tall, distinguished-looking man who appears completely at home in the sports jacket and slacks in which he is usually attired. He is a cool, imposing speaker. His words flow evenly, and they hit with the clear ring of fine crystal. In his presentation before the U.S. Olympics Committee, he talked eloquently of Squaw Valley's beauty and its magnificent slopes, which offer skiing with all exposures to the sun. Squaw Valley's unique layout, he continued, was such that spectators, all of whom would be quartered in surrounding areas, could commute for each day's events and empty out at night, leaving the valley free of constant congestion. Finally, he assured the committee that all resources needed for staging the games had been pledged by the State of California, whose hospitality had no peer.

Much to the shock of winter-sports authorities around the Nation, not to mention Cushing's rivals, Squaw Valley was chosen as the U.S. candidate. Snorted a delegate from Lake Placid, "If you ask me, the whole place"—Squaw Valley—"is a figment of Cushing's imagination."

The selection came as a surprise even to Cushing. "Up to then, I was going mostly on palaver," he says today. "I had won the first round, but the big problem was still ahead—how to sell Squaw Valley to the foreigners."

The final choice was to be made by the International Olympics Committee at a meeting in Paris in June. The Winter Olympics are traditionally a European proposition. Of the seven winter games staged in the past, six have been awarded to Europe and one to Lake Placid. Since 1936 European athletes have dominated the Winter Olympics. The honors at Cortina were divided largely among Russians, Austrians, Swiss, and Scandinavians. The United States won in only two divisions, the men's and women's figure skating.

Cushing felt that, although he could do nothing to improve the skill of our winter-sports athletes, he at least could arrange for them to lose on their own soil. He went back to Placer County. Victory, he assured officials there, was now within sight. They came up with $12,000. From the Southern California Committee for the Olympic Games he got $2,000 more, even though southern Californians aren't ordinarily in the habit of encouraging promotions in the northern part of the State. The remainder of a $50,000 war chest was donated by the Squaw Valley Development Co., whose stockholders were convinced by Cushing that opportunity at last was knocking to put Squaw Valley on the map.

Money matters now out of the way, Cushing departed for Europe to make his reconnaissance of the opposition. Other cities bidding for the 1960 winter games were Austria's Innsbruck, Switzerland's Saint-Moritz, and Garmisch-Partenkirchen in West Germany. Since previous Olympics had been awarded to Saint-Moritz and Garmisch, the overwhelming favorite this time was Innsbruck.

In Europe, Cushing met a veteran foreign correspondent for the Chicago Daily News, George Weller. The picture that Cushing painted of Squaw Valley was so intriguing and his arguments for bringing the games there so convincing that Weller was moved to volunteer his services—if his editor in Chicago was agreeable.

Returning to America, Cushing went directly to the offices of the Chicago Daily News. In no time at all, he persuaded executive editor Basil Walters to keep Weller on the Daily News payroll while letting him work gratis for Squaw Valley. Cushing and Weller began to plan their strategy. To offset the strong support that would go to Innsbruck from Austria's neighbors and from anti-American strongholds behind the Iron Curtain, they figured they needed votes from nations that generally don't concern themselves with the Winter Olympics. Cushing and Weller decided they could best secure votes by personal contact with Olympic committeemen. They divided up the world. Weller would go to South America and the Caribbean, heading from there to the Scandinavian countries. Cushing would salvage what he could in Western Europe.

Their strongest talking point, they figured, was Squaw Valley's physical layout, which for the first time would make it possible for all the Winter Olympics events to be seen in the same place. At Cortina in 1956, for instance, the skating was held in a village 18 miles away, and the ski jump in another village 3 miles distant. In Squaw Valley, every event either would finish or be staged in its entirety in the one area.

OLYMPICS VILLAGE

A second selling point was the idea of having a Winter Olympics village for the athletes. This was another first. Participants in the summer games are always quartered in the privacy of their own village, but the winter competitors usually live in public hotels, where, as Cushing puts it, "other guests drink beer and raise hell until all hours."

A third argument for Squaw Valley was the need for holding the Winter Olympics in a new locale—namely, among the Pacific family of nations. Satisfied that their case was sound, Weller departed for South America and Cushing left for Europe, enlisting the help en route of a Harvard classmate named Marshall Hazeltine, a polished expert in the field of public relations.

"Hazeltine is what you'd call a top-level man," says Cushing proudly. "He attended Eton, has worked on diplomatic missions abroad for our State Department and has excellent contacts all over Europe. He also speaks French, Italian, and German fluently."

By the time the Squaw Valley triumvirate reached Paris for the meeting of the International Olympic Committee, they had a dossier on each of the 62 delegates attending. They had also obtained an endorsement from President Eisenhower, who had signed a joint resolution, passed by Congress, inviting the world to Squaw Valley.

Each group bidding for the Olympics was granted 30 minutes in which to state its case before the committee. In preparing the all-important speech, Cushing, Weller, and Hazeltine realized that Squaw Valley's chief weakness was the scarcity of facilities there. Considering the $1 million budget, there was no prospect of startling improvements. However, they conceived a way of converting this liability into a sales asset.

"It came to us like a vibration from heaven," says Cushing. "Psychologically, this was our knockout punch. We would plead poverty—poor-mouth it all over the place. When had Americans ever admitted abroad that they had nothing? We wouldn't try to compete with the rich European resorts, which would stage the games with Roman grandeur. Ours would be a healthy, unadorned games in a clean, simple atmosphere, free from commercial pressure and public interference."

And so the Squaw Valley bid officially was dedicated to "Restoring the Olympic ideal to the winter games." Cushing and Weller decided that the speech might have added impact if delivered by Hazeltine in French, the language of the revered founder of the modern Olympics, the late Pierre de Coubertin.

Hazeltine, a man of quiet charm, spoke impressively to the delegation for 22 minutes. In the remaining 8 minutes Cushing delivered a crisp summary in which he emphasized that the cost of sending athletes to Squaw Valley would not be high. He guaranteed that transportation on a charter arrangement and 3 weeks of room and board with decent accommodations would not exceed $500 for any athlete.

On the first ballot cast by the committee, Squaw Valley, aided by strong South American support, polled a surprising 30 votes, as opposed to 24 for Innsbruck, 6 for Saint Moritz, and 2 for Garmisch. Squaw Valley and Innsbruck moved to the finals. To most observers, it seemed a foregone conclusion that the Europeans who had backed Saint Moritz and Garmisch would now swing their votes to Innsbruck. On the second ballot, however, Squaw Valley won by a count of 32 votes to 30, the closest finish in I.O.C. history.

Innsbruck took the defeat hard. Not impressed by the Squaw Valley platform of friendly but humble games, the Innsbruck newspaper editorialized tartly. "The rich Americans may have won, but the Olympic ideal has been defeated."

In California there were jubilant headlines. Champagne toasts were drunk to Cushing, the supersalesman. Then the roof fell in. The State quickly discovered that it had a sputtering bobcat by the tail.

COST PER ATHLETE

To begin with, Cushing's guarantee to the IOC of a $500 maximum cost per athlete for travel and living expenses turned out to be a slight miscalculation. State experts figured the bill at $725 per athlete. This meant a total cost to California of $270,000, because, as an official of the California Olympic Commission explains, "Rather than renege on a guarantee, we will make up the difference."

BUDGET UP TO $4 MILLION

Secondly, the $1 million originally allocated for the games proved a noticeably short figure. Cushing's revised estimate came to $2,400,000. When State architects and engineers got busy and started totaling up such sums as $2 million for an ice arena, $440,000 for a sewer system and $300,000 for flood control, the cost quickly expanded to $4 million.

When it was found that the ice arena would cost a million more than originally expected, and the next total estimate came to $5 million, the California Legislature rebelled. Some members suggested it would be sinful to take the Winter Olympics away from such a garden spot as Innsbruck. Many taxpayers agreed.

There was, however, the matter of California pride, not to mention the endorsements of the President, Congress and Governor Knight. The feeling soon grew in the California Olympic Commission and the Olympic Organizing Committee, both appointed by Governor Knight, that if anything was worth sponsoring in California, it was worth sponsoring in a manner befitting the State's reputation. They eventually won out in a hard fight over the economy-minded faction.

UP TO $8 MILLION

Right now the cost of the games has risen to $8 million, and with heavy expenditures still in sight. Squaw Valley has asked Congress for a $3,800,000 appropriation. (Note: not due for action until April.)

H. D. Thoreau, executive secretary of the commission, explains, "To justify all the spending for the Winter Olympics, it has been decided to make a State park in Squaw Valley of all the land on which the State is doling out money for improvements. To do this, the original $5 million investment must be protected by expenditure of an additional $3 million to convert the area into a permanent installation."

The idea of a State park for winter and summer recreation is acceptable to most taxpayers in California, but not to the biggest landowner in Squaw Valley, Wayne Poulsen, who has opposed the plan from the outset. Of the 1,200 acres that Poulsen holds in the area—valley and hillside—the State wants to buy 63½ and lease 129 for 2 years. This land is an indispensable part of the proposed 480-acre winter Olympics tract.

For 2 years, Poulsen refused to sell. When he finally agreed last fall, he demanded a price so high that the State balked. At the time, the State had wanted to buy 73½ acres for which it offered $103,000. Unblinkingly, Poulsen made a counter offer of $440,000, whereupon the State invoked the law of eminent domain and carried the case to Placer County court. Since the State has amended its complaint, asking for only 63½ acres, plus other land for lease, the court must now determine an equitable price. The court is due to take up the case sometime this month or next.

Of the California Olympic Commission's many headaches, Poulsen currently rates as No. 1. A quiet, sturdy man of 41 with a penchant for the outdoors, Poulsen flies the polar route for Pan American from San Francisco to London. As a ski fan and hunter, he first came to Squaw Valley in 1938, shortly after his graduation from the University of Nevada. He began to buy acreage on credit, acquiring tiny parcels at a time. After World War II, he and his wife, Sandy, and their five children moved permanently to the valley, occupying a tent until they could build a home.

To the best of Poulsen's knowledge, he and his family were the first full-time residents there since the gold prospectors cleared out in the 1840's. Remains of the mining villages of Claraville and Knoxville can still be seen at the east end of the valley, through which the old Emigrant Trail passed, leading across the Sierras. It was only a few miles away that members of the Donner party perished in 1846.

The Poulsens have dreamed for years of developing Squaw Valley into a charming alpine-type community—a sort of small-scale Saint-Moritz. Poulsen cringes at the thought of a State park. Envisioning campers, hamburger stands, souvenir hawkers, and the like on land where he had planned his dream village, he has fought the State doggedly.

POULSEN NAMES $3 MILLION KILLING

California officials, however, are resolute in their feeling that one man's real estate ambitions shouldn't take precedence over the public welfare. P. K. Macker, assistant to the president of the organizing committee, adds: "Despite himself, Poulsen will become rich off the Olympics. They will considerably increase the value of his land"—the bulk of which is not directly involved. "He should make a $3 million killing."

Poulsen's opposition isn't all that the State has had to cope with lately. It has a major rhubarb on its hands, with the International Federation of Bobsledders and Tobagganers, which is protesting the elimination of bobsledding from the Squaw Valley program. Olympic rules specify that no single event need be staged unless entries have been received from at least 12 nations. Since fewer than that number answered in a poll that they would compete in the bobsledding, Squaw Valley seized the opportunity to drop the event, thereby saving the $750,000 cost of building a bobsled run.

Says Alan Bartholemy, technical director of the Squaw Valley games, "The federation has demanded we build the bob run, under threat of exposing us to the world as American cheapskates." The Amateur Athletic Union of this country has joined in asking that bobsledding be offered.

The Russians, too, have been unhappy. They have roared their indignation over fingerprinting requirements made of all foreigners entering this country. The California Olympic Commission has asked Congress to waive the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act for all Olympic athletes.

Further concessions are needed for Russian satellite countries not recognized by our State Department. Caught in a crossfire between the International Olympic Committee, which does not acknowledge political differences, and Senator JOHN BUTLER, of Maryland, who has demanded that the satellites be barred, Squaw Valley has appealed to John Foster Dulles to admit all nations which wish to compete in the games. Barring any world upheaval, Dulles has promised to comply.

Meanwhile, trying to balance a budget that is shaking precariously, Squaw Valley is still moving ahead with preparations for an elaborate Olympics. "We have spent $200,000 for expert advice alone," says Bartholemy. "We will probably have the finest and most novel winter games of all time."

At this stage, four ski courses have been completed in Squaw Valley, and foundations laid for new buildings. Land has been graded for the ice arena and a hillside cleared for the ski jumps. Work has been finished, too, on a $155,000 ski chair. As a flood-control measure, engineers have also begun the rerouting of Squaw Creek, which runs through the heart of the valley's meadowland, where much of the proceedings will take place.

When snow melts this spring, the bulk of the construction, delayed a year by Poulsen's land fight, will start at an accelerated pace. This is the first winter Olympics ever planned from the ground up. In the past, Olympic construction has been mostly superimposed by the host cities upon existing facilities. But almost everything at Squaw Valley will be new, including a sprawling Olympic village, which will quarter some 1,200 athletes, trainers, and coaches from 35 nations.

The village will overlook a scenic 10-acre artificial lake, for which ground will soon be removed. About 500 yards away will be built the ice arena, center of Olympic activities. From there, a walk of no more than 200 yards will bring one to any event. It won't be necessary to go even that far to see what's taking place because, from a comfortable seat in the heated arena, spectators will be able to watch the show flashed on a giant screen by closed-circuit television. Camera towers to be built along the Alpine and Nordic ski courses will bring viewers a picture of the races in progress.

For not-so-hardy members of the press, who don't relish an invigorating trudge in the snow, there also will be closed-circuit television in the lavish press center, adjacent to the ice arena. This structure, complete with restaurant, cocktail lounge, snackbars, and locker rooms, will accommodate 600 working writers.

Other new facilities will include a speed-skating rink, 3 hockey rinks, 3 ski jumps, a ski chair, several restaurants, cafeterias, warming huts, and a network of spectator centers, all equipped with closed-circuit TV.

Squaw Valley has made arrangements with the Navy to conduct snow-compaction tests this year to determine whether automobiles could be parked in the meadowland. If this doesn't prove feasible, a unique traffic plan has been worked out whereby private cars will be barred from the valley entirely. The expected 30,000 people per day will be shuttled instead by 250 busses, leaving every few minutes from the nearby communities of Tahoe City and Truckee. Bus service will be free to those purchasing tickets to the Olympic events.

Alexander Cushing's original theme of restoring the Olympic ideal in a natural setting devoid of embellishments has long since been forgotten. With deep-felt pride, Governor Knight recently told the International Olympic Committee, "In the State of California, there are many monuments to the creative and engineering genius of our citizens * * * We are confident that this same technical skill will lead to construction of winter-sports facilities in Squaw Valley which will greatly exceed the expectations of our visitors who will come to this great event from all parts of the world."

Cushing isn't in the least crushed that most of his poverty-inspired ideas have been discarded in favor of more grandiose plans. "I truthfully don't see the need for such extravagance," he says. "But, as far as I'm concerned, my feelings won't be hurt if they spend $20 million—just as long as all the stories on the games are datelined, 'Squaw Valley.'"

BONANZA IN THE WILDERNESS

On the twisting trails that lace the flanks of Vermont's Mount Mansfield, traffic was so heavy that skiers had trouble keeping out of one another's way. On Michigan's Boyne Mountain, colorfully garbed schussboomers cheerfully endured long waits to ride lifts up the glistening white mountainside. Restaurants on Colorado's Aspen Mountain were overrun with crowds. Thousands left their sitzmarks on the deep powder slopes of California's Sierras and Washington's Cascade Range. Whenever there was snow, busloads of weekend skiers left New York and Chicago at first light, and in Nevada deserts sweaty cowboys watched mountain-bound cars go by, skis lashed to the roofs.

FROM FANATICS TO FAMILIES

In less than 25 years, skiing has been transformed from an eccentric practice pursued by a handful of fanatic, chilblained young men to the U.S.'s fastest-growing outdoor winter sport. Today, anybody skis—corporation president and office boy, college student and secretary, parents and children. It is no longer a pastime for the well-heeled who could afford to go to Europe to learn. The skiing establishment at Aspen, Colo., is a typical example of what the sport has added to the face of the United States. A broken-down mining settlement as late as 1946, Aspen now boasts some 50 ski lodges, offers a wide range of overnight accommodations, from Ed's Beds ($2.75 and down) to the luxurious new Villa Lamarr ($8 and up), financed by Hedy Lamarr's estranged husband, Howard Lee, and promptly dubbed Hedy's Beddies.

Keys to the U.S.'s ski boom were the rope tow and its more advanced counterpart, the chair lift. The first rope tow, a jury rig powered by a truck engine, was installed at Woodstock, Vt., in 1934, the first chair lift at Sun Valley, Idaho, in 1937. Until then a skier had to be young and determined enough to rise at dawn, spend most of the day trudging up the side of a mountain for the sake of one or two swift descents. The tow made skiing a downhill run all the way.

This winter an estimated 3 million skiers will be out on slopes from Maine's Sugarloaf Mountain to Oregon's Mount Hood. There is skiing in Taos, N. Mex., and on North Carolina's Mount Mitchell, and ski clubs have appeared in Amarillo, Tex., and Louisville, Ky.

SNOW FEVER

Resort owners are convinced that the boom is still young, and are pushing ahead with expansion plans, undismayed by the uncertainties inherent in snow itself—not enough of it in the East, where slopes must be closely tended to preserve what falls, often too much of it in the West, where gun crews must shoot down avalanches to ensure safety and jumbo storms can seal off an area for days. Vermont's Mountain Snow opened the first outdoor swimming pool at an eastern ski resort. California's plush new $1,750,000 inn at Mammoth Mountain was doing a land-office business. Michigan's Boyne Mountain resort was plowing back $250,000 a year into improvements. All in all, there were no fewer than 90 new overhead lifts operating in U.S. areas this winter, and more were on the way.

For the past year, the most feverish of all ski area preparations have been centered in and around a narrow, steep-sided valley high in the California Sierras, 200 miles northeast of San Francisco, 40 miles southwest of Reno, and 6 miles from Lake Tahoe. Despite the snow and cold last week, work crews poured into Squaw Valley to put the finishing touches on four handsome, pastel-shaded dormitories, transform a shell of bright orange girders into a skating rink, built lift towers. Navy snow-compaction teams experimented with tamping down a large meadow to serve as a parking lot. A year from now, some 1,000 athletes and 35,000 spectators from all over the world will jam Squaw Valley daily during the 1960 winter Olympic games; to make sure that all will go right, the State of California and the U.S. Government are pouring millions into a place that only a decade or so ago was wilderness.

TACT AND TACTICS

Squaw Valley's position as a ski resort and Olympics site is the work of a tall (6-foot 5-inch), slat-lean man of eastern socialite background (New York, Newport) and upbringing (Groton, Harvard) named Alexander Cochrane Cushing. With no experience at developing or running such a place, Alec Cushing proceeded purposefully through trial and error at Squaw Valley, made some horrendous mistakes in judgment and tact en route. But he pulled a master coup in wangling the Olympics for his own backyard, a tactic that will leave him, after the Olympics are over, in the center of a $14 million establishment which will put Squaw Valley squarely in the top rank of U.S. ski areas.

Such figures no longer startle ski men, for skiing has become big business. This year skiers will spend an estimated $120 million on accommodations, transportation, lift tickets and equipment. They will pay $5 million for skis, a like amount for pants and parkas, $4 million for boots. East and West, ski shops reported business at new highs, up as much as 40 percent from last season.

FLOATING AND DEFYING

Ski equipment comes in a wide price range—most of it expensive. Most beginners find themselves impelled to spend at least $150 if they are to feel properly equipped. As for clothes, an old pair of jodhpurs and an old sweater will no longer do. Even the raw novice feels a compulsive need for skintight Bogner stretch pants ($50), quilted parka ($30) and Alpine sweater ($30).

But the dedicated scorn details of money. Sometimes they seem to consider skiing less a sport than a mystical experience. They get rhapsodic when they try to explain the feeling that makes a few hours on a slope worth the long tortuous trip to get there and the possibility of a broken bone. "When I ski," explains one buff, "I feel like a fellow in a dream, floating through the air, defying gravity, conscious only of the hissing of the skis through the snow. The only thing that vaguely resembles the sensation is flying. Unlike any other sport, the skier is completely on his own. Once he begins his descent, no one can help him."

THE CULT

By common consent, skiing is the greatest device for social mixing since the decline of the office party. Among its rituals are the hot buttered rum around the fireplace in the evening, the songs, the exchange of stories on the day's moment of triumph or disaster. "Where else can two young people get to know each other better than at a ski resort hundreds of miles from home?" asks one resort owner. "A girl can look real cute in a ski outfit, especially in those stretch pants," a ski tour director points out.

Skiers develop a language of their own, happily swap such German terms as geländesprung (a jump), schussboomer (one who dashes headlong straight down a slope) and sitzmark (the imprint left in the snow by a fallen skier's hindquarters), refer familiarly to moguls (bumps in the slopes) and snowplows (a novice's slow stop maneuver). Even skiing's hazards provide a bond of sorts. Ski magazine estimates that in an average year one in every ten skiers will injure himself more or less seriously. Every ski lodge boasts its quota of walking wounded. Most innkeepers consider them poor advertising. Grumbles one healthy skier: "They wear their plaster casts like badges of honor. As a comeon, they usually ask you to autograph the cast."

Stalking through his Squaw Valley lodge last week, Alec Cushing signed no plaster casts. He is not the type. He sees no reason for making small talk with people he does not know, feels little of the easy camaraderie that skiers cherish. Most skiers concede a grudging admiration for his salesmanship, immediately follow with the charge that he sold Squaw Valley to the Olympic nations, not on the basis of what was there, but on what he hoped the State would provide. In fact, Cushing at the time owned only one chair lift and just 6 acres of level land on the valley floor. But by the imperatives of terrain, every one of the ski runs ends at his front door step. In effect, he owned home plate, and the authorities could not do without him even if they wanted to.

"I'M TERRIBLE"

Western skiers dislike Cushing because he is Eastern, because he barged into Squaw Valley, ultimately (and legally) took the ski operations there away from a California native who planned the area and owned most of the valley land, and because he has the annoying habit of walking precipitously away from a guest, leaving a conversation dangling in midsentence. Says the wife of a neighboring resort owner: "I'd like to like Cushing, but he's so rude. We've been introduced 26 times, and he never remembers me." Admits Cushing: "I'm terrible with the public. I don't like that professional oily quality, but I guess I'm wrong. People at resorts like to say the owner talked to them. Here they say, 'That sonofabitch Cushing didn't speak to me for the 13th consecutive day.'"

To his friends, and to strangers when he wants something from them, Cushing can display a formidable charm, and a determination that is awesome. But Alec Cushing had a certain rudeness about him from the beginning. "He was a beautiful baby," recalls his older sister, Mrs. Lily Cushing Boyd. "He was also the most determined boy you ever saw. Whenever people came up and went 'itchykoo' at him, Alexander would lie back and bark like a sea lion." He was born to wealth. His grandfather, Robert M. Cushing, was an old Boston tea merchant. His father was a talented painter, died when Alec was 4. Young Cushing grew up in New York and Newport luxury. A gangling, tree-tall adolescent with a huge head topped by unruly red hair, Alec inevitably got the nickname "Pin," learned to play tennis well enough to reach the quarter-finals of the Newport Invitational when he was 16. He prepared for the match (against Wilmer Allison) by drinking till dawn, then amazed himself by taking a 4 to 1 lead in the second set. At this point his hangover caught up with him. Says Cushing: "I had a total blackout. When I tried to throw the ball up for service, I almost went flat on my face. At least that's my story. My friends say Allison looked at his watch, noticed that it was nearly lunchtime, and quickly ran off five straight games."

At Groton, the gangling Cushing was a good-hit, no-field first baseman. ("I couldn't bend over far enough to get to ground balls"), did the crudest kind of skiing (classmates recall he was forever stepping out of his bindings, losing skis on the slightest of hills). At Harvard he played squash, flopped at crew ("I learned a wrist trick—a way of making a big puddle without actually pulling hard. The coach caught me one afternoon, stopped the boat and took me off").

As a matter of course, he made the Porcellian Club. Summers he traveled abroad, became expert at living like a first-class passenger on a third-class ticket. On one voyage, he ingratiated himself with Boxing Manager Joe (I should have stood in bed) Jacobs before the ship left the dock, spent most of the trip playing poker on A-deck with Jacobs, Max Schmeling, and Morton Downey. In his sophomore year Alec decided summer trips were too short, set out to get his degree in 3 years, didn't quite make it (he lacked one-half unit), but managed a 9-month tour of the Far East (on which he visited with Fred Astaire) while his classmates labored back in Cambridge.

Graduating in 1936, Cushing cast around for something to do, decided to go to Harvard Law School. "I had no particular love for the law," he admits, "but the alternative was going to work."

MATTER OF CONTACTS

Before he left Harvard Law, Cushing married blonde, blue-eyed Justine Cutting, socialite daughter of Dr. Fulton Cutting, of New York, professor of physics at New Jersey's Stevens Institute. His closest friend (and fellow Porcellian), Alexander McFadden, had married Justine's older sister. All through his life Alex Cushing has known important people, and casually made the most of his contacts. Desultorily looking for a job, Cushing ran into his old Groton classmate, Stewart Alsop, through him got an interview with Justice Department Trustbuster Thurman Arnold, who promptly hired him.

With the outbreak of war, Cushing was commissioned in the Navy ("I figured I'd get drafted anyway"). Assigned as a troubleshooter for Naval Air Transport Service, he traveled to all war theaters, worked as he never had before.

On one occasion he flew to Brazil, found a Naval transport station sorely in need of dockage equipment. Ironically, the very equipment needed was stored only four miles away but assigned to the Rubber Development Corporation. Federal law forbade transfer to the Navy, so Cushing decided the law needed changing. He flew back to Washington, went to Secretary of the Navy James Forrestal, got his backing, helped prepare the legislation, all in one stretch of 60 hours without sleep. The bill passed, but the strain proved too much. He collapsed, wound up in Bethesda Naval Hospital.

THE NUT WARD

"When I came to," he recalls, "I was in the nut ward. My face was totally paralyzed. My eyes were frozen open. The nurses had to tape them shut at night so I could get to sleep." From his bout with hard work, Lieut. Commander Cushing was left with a partial paralysis of the left side of his face that still pulls down the corner of his mouth, gives him a quizzical look. He was philosophical ("There was not a damn thing I could do about it, so what was the use of worrying?") At war's end he went back to the law (in Wall Street), stuck it out for two years, quit in boredom ("The war taught me life could be exciting".)

TRAGEDY

Cushing first saw Squaw Valley in 1946, hiked into it (there was no road then) with a likable skier and Pan American World Airways pilot named Wayne Poulsen, who had bought up much of the valley's land. Over the bridge table that night, Alex cautiously asked his wife: "How would you like to live in these mountains?" Justine did not look up from her cards. "Are you out of your mind, Cushing?" she inquired icily. But 2 years later the Cushings and the McFaddens headed west once more to check on Squaw as a possible ski resort. They never got there. Skiing down a dangerous slope at Aspen with two experienced skiers one morning, the two brothers-in-law were trapped when a huge avalanche cut loose above them. Cushing was buried to his neck. Alexander McFadden died under tons of snow. The death of his closest friend was a profound shock to Cushing, still reduces him to sobs whenever he tells the story.

Despite the tragedy, Cushing was obsessed with opening a ski area, went into partnership with Airman Poulsen to develop Squaw in June 1948. Poulsen supplied the land—640 acres—and Cushing the money—$400,000. Alec and Justine invested $145,000 of their own, got $50,000 from Laurance Rockefeller, the rest from other friends.

Poulsen and Cushing had differences almost from the start. Cushing allowed Poulsen to reserve 42 acres of land for homesites, found belatedly that Squaw Valley Development Corp. was left with only 6 acres of level ground. Cushing wanted to operate restaurant, bar, and lodging facilities at Squaw. Poulsen wanted to lease them out. Cushing went ahead anyway, bought a set of old Air Force barracks, had them trucked into the valley, put the corporation in the hotel business.

TROUBLE

In Squaw's first 5 years of operation, avalanches ripped out lift towers three times. The lodge was cut off four times by bridge washouts, flooded out twice, later (in 1956) burned to the ground. Poulsen and Cushing had increasingly sharp differences. The showdown came in October 1949, when, in Poulsen's absence on an international flight for Pan Am, his wife, Sandy, fired off letters to Squaw stockholders accusing Cushing of mismanagement. A stockholders' meeting was called, and the result was inevitable, since Cushing owned 52 percent of the stock, his friends another 46 percent. After an audit showed nothing legally wrong, Cushing replaced Poulsen as president of Squaw Valley Development. Today, a bitter Poulsen still controls choice homesites in the valley (and stands to become a millionaire with the land boom caused by Cushing's getting the Olympics), but Cushing and the corporation have exclusive ski rights, since they possess the only lift permit allotted to the area by the U.S. Forest Service.

The opening of Squaw Valley Lodge on Thanksgiving Day, 1949, was a memorable fiasco. Cushing had to hire strikebreakers when his union workmen struck the week of the opening, hooked up plumbing himself. Justine hurriedly summoned the domestic couple from their New York home, pressed a friend into service as a chambermaid. One woman guest arrived early, found Cushing still at work on the plumbing. Snarled Alec: "Madam, come back in 3 hours, and we'll be ready. Meanwhile, don't bother me." That night everything went wrong. There was no dinner until 10. Only one toilet was working, and the waiting line for it snaked out into the lobby. One of Cushing's daughters tripped, broke her leg. A guest ran over one of his dogs. The whole thing was, to use Cushing's word, ghastly.

TO GET SPACE

One day in 1954, a two-paragraph item in the San Francisco Chronicle caught Alec Cushing's eye. Reno had bid for the Olympic games. Cushing had only one chair lift at Squaw then, but he decided to apply, too. "I had no more interest in getting the games than the man in the moon," he admits. "It was just a way of getting some newspaper space." The space he got in west coast papers brought a flood of encouraging letters, made up Cushing's mind: "When I got letters from all those people saying what a nice thing I was doing, it made me feel bad."

There were only 6 weeks in which to ready Squaw Valley's bid for consideration as the U.S. nominee to stage the games. Cushing moved quickly, enlisted the support of California State Senator Harold ("Biz") Johnson and Governor Goodie Knight, got the legislators to revive an old bill that had promised Los Angeles money to back its successful 1932 summer Olympics bid, pass a new version to guarantee $1 million for Squaw. Old friend and Squaw stockholder (5 percent) Laurance Rockefeller gave his support. With evidence of financial backing, a hastily prepared brochure and a charming dissertation on Squaw ("I'm a very strong speaker when I'm convinced"), Cushing sold the U.S. committee. His next target was the delegates to the Paris meeting of the International Olympic Committee, who would decide the site of the games.

THE TRIUMVIRATE

For the selling job, Cushing called on two fellow Harvardmen for help: George Weller, globetrotting reporter for the Chicago Daily News, and Marshall Haseltine, urbane expatriate who lived in Europe. Weller got a leave of absence to work with Cushing. He drove into Squaw Valley over the rutted dirt road from State Highway 89, took one horrified look and decided on the spot that the pitch had to be a return to Olympic ideals of togetherness and simplicity, in contrast to Europe's ornate resorts.

Applicants' brochures were customarily printed in English, French, and German. Weller noted that "only two countries spoke German, and they both wanted the Olympics in their own area," ordered Spanish substituted for German to please Latin American delegates. Weller embarked on a 4-month tour of South America to emphasize the advantages of an Olympics in the Western Hemisphere. His next trip was to Scandinavia, where he plugged the idea of a simple Olympics to thrifty Swedes and Norwegians. Cushing and Haseltine took on other European International Olympic Committee representatives.

THE SOFT SELL

By the time the crucial meeting convened in Paris, Cushing and Company had made personal contact with 42 of the 62 delegates. The three Americans hung out unobtrusively in cocktail bars frequented by delegates, never pushed themselves, but were always available. Cushing had ordered a huge (7-foot by 12-foot) relief model of Squaw Valley at a cost of $2,800, had it shipped to Paris for $3,000. The monster proved so big it would not fit through the door of the International Olympic Committee exhibit room, but after lodging was found for it down the street delegates went out of their way to go see it, thereby giving the Americans a chance to practice the soft sell away from competing exhibits.

Despite all the groundwork, the outlook was not bright for Squaw when the meeting opened. Huffed a German delegate to Cushing: "Don't think you are going to parlay one ski lift into an Olympic Game." Even a U.S. delegate sneered: "Who's going to vote for you? I'm not." Austria's Innsbruck was Squaw's chief competitor, and seemed a sure winner when one of the delegates charged that Squaw was totally unprepared to stage an Olympics, furthermore should be disqualified because it was not a town (it still is not). Summoned to the meeting room for an explanation, Cushing turned on the charm. There should be no fears about readying an Olympic plant at Squaw, he argued. After all, there were 4 years in which to build it, said he, and had not the governments of both California and the U.S. endorsed Squaw's bid? As for the town technicality, "We're all sportsmen here, not politicians." Squaw Valley won the bid, 32–30 over Innsbruck, on the second ballot.

CONFLICT OF INTERESTS

Triumphantly Cushing returned to the United States, ran head-long into a stern warning from the International Olympic Committee's crusty chairman, Avery Brundage: Cushing, you are going to set back the Olympic movement 25 years. For a time, it appeared that Brundage had something. Cushing could count on the piddling $1 million voted by the State, but even in his most poor-mouth moment, he never envisioned that the games could be staged for less than $2 million.

Somehow he managed to inveigle a group of prominent Californians to serve as a watchdog commission over the steadily expanding State expenditures at Squaw. He became president of the Olympic Organizing Committee that had been set up to stage the games. The conflict of interests was obvious at once to everyone but Cushing. He stubbornly insisted that Cushing the Olympics promoter and Cushing the resort owner could lead separate lives, finally stepped down in December 1955 as cries mounted for his scalp.

THE PRICE GOES UP

The new committee chairman, tough-talking Prentis Cobb Hale, head of a West Coast department-store chain, promptly told Cushing to go back to Squaw and keep his nose out of Olympic business. "He treated me like a criminal," complains Cushing. "He gave orders that none of his employees were to talk to me when they came up here." Saddled with making good on Cushing's extravagant promises to the Olympic nations, purposeful Prentis Hale brooked no nonsense, made few friends, but ultimately got results.

An architect's survey determined that there would have to be sewage and flood-control facilities, access roads, an ice-skating stadium and practice rinks, a ski jump area, at least three new lifts. On top of that, dormitories would have to be built. Total estimated cost: at least $8 million. Hale got $4 million from the legislature, had to go back for $2,990,000 more. When the State finally balked, he got $4 million from the Federal Government.

The Olympic program for Squaw Valley is rolling along on schedule. The 3,300-foot lift for slalom runs is finished; another up Squaw Peak is under construction. The dormitories are virtually complete, the jump is ready, administration buildings are up, the skating arena is well along. At the State's insistence, Cushing has built a spectacular new 5,000-foot lift up the side of Squaw Peak's neighbor, KT–22.

HOME FROM HOT DOGS

Cushing's own property stands at the focus of the Olympic activity area. He has survived criticism and natural catastrophe with great aplomb. The burned-out lodge has been replaced, is now an adequate blue-pastel structure featuring a radiant-heated outdoor dining terrace and candlelit cocktail lounge in which jazz pianist Ralph Sutton displays his talents. Critics still complain that Cushing begrudges many comforts, that his sleeping quarters are still far from first class, overpriced ($18 a day) and resound to every footfall. Cushing admits that his accommodations could be better, will decide after the Olympics just how to improve them.

The Cushings live just 100 yards from the lodge, in what once was a hot dog stand in the resort's early days. It has been converted and expanded into a comfortable, split-level home, featuring bright crimson walls and ceilings in the main living area. Here Alec and Justine can relax with their three daughters—Justine, 18 (at Radcliffe College); Lily, 15 (at swank Foxcroft in Virginia); and Alexandra, 10, who attends school in nearby Truckee.

Though he will have no direct stake in the Olympics (the State will run his lodge and lifts during the games), Alec Cushing is in sight of the big payoff. He has contracts for a 10-year lease on the new lifts the State is building. A new superhighway to the valley entrance from Reno and San Francisco will make it easier than ever to get there. Later this month, as a testament to the revitalized valley, the North American skiing championships will be held there for the first time.

Cushing stands at his front doorstep, gazes fondly at his lodge, at the Olympic work progressing all around him, listens contentedly to the soft whirring of the lifts. His blue eyes roam up and down the white, pine-pocked slopes. He smiles faintly, "We should do pretty well here from now on," he says, "unless we hack things up—and we probably will."

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, the principal purpose of having these articles printed in the RECORD is to show how an inconsequential project, from the standpoint of money, grew into a multimillion-dollar expenditure. I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the bill, I may say to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], but I want the RECORD to show that on the basis of the method chosen for developing the program, I shall not vote for the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I appreciate the statement, characteristically honest in nature, of the Senator from Ohio. While it is true that the consent of the State Department was not obtained by Chicago prior to the initiation of the invitations, the approval of that Department has since been obtained, and the President of the United States has agreed to act as honorary chairman. We are observing all the safeguards which the Senator from Ohio desires, and which were not followed in the case of the Ohio project.

I have no further comment to make. I hope the Senate may proceed to vote on this measure.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am advised that tomorrow will be the 69th anniversary of the Organization of American States. This organization, which has endured for 69 years, has been instrumental in developing in this hemisphere a great family of 21 nations.

A responsibility rests on every one of these nations to bring into orbit such cultural relations and exchanges of confidence and of good will which will solidify this organization and our relationships with our great and good neighbors to the south.

I think the bill before the Senate, if and when it is passed, as I trust it will be without difficulty very shortly, will bring together a great host of athletes who will come to this country and that their visit will result in an accretion to the reservoir of good will which is so necessary to the cohesive force of an organization of this kind.

Two thousand young athletes would, indeed, be a great missionary force from the republics to the south. I think of this event in terms of the fact that the world and the future belong to youth.

The Apostle Paul once wrote a magnificent sentence in a letter to his young friend whom he had sent forth as a missionary: "Let no man despise thy youth."

Never was I so much impressed with what youth can do in the field of developing good relationships as I was in 1940, when I sat in a bleacher seat on the Avenida Juarez, in Mexico City, and saw a parade which lasted for 14 hours, in which young athletes from all over Mexico participated. It was one of the most impressive sights I ever witnessed.

I could readily understand the great missionary surge which went not only through that great metropolitan center, but also through the people of the country as they sent their players of games of all kinds—football, baseball, track, soccer, and the other games—to compete, in the hope, of course, that their capacities and capabilities would dominate, and that they would come home with the prizes. It was one of those great events which I think helped Mexico over and above anything else to develop a certain stability, a stability which is manifested today.

So I say that the future and the destiny of the world belong to youth. In proportion as we cultivate it, energize it, and encourage it, so we shall serve a great and useful purpose in a world which is still too troubled with too many fevers.

Mr. President, what would be better than to have a great outlet for youthful energies? Competitive games are the natural outlet for the energies of youth. I remember the days when I was on a track team in high school. I once won a bronze medal—it was the lowest award given—in the mile race. I hung that medal on the wall in my home, behind glass, so it would not tarnish; and year after year I used to see it there. I prized it highly. I never was much of an athlete; but when I won third place in the mile run in that county contest, I took the greatest pride in that award; in fact, I think I prized it more than membership in the Senate. Of course things are relative, depending on how old one is.

So I think of the great resurgence of spirit of the part of the athletes who will come to the United States. I also think of the envious young Americans, all over our country, who will be saving their money, in the hope of going to Soldiers Field and seeing what the young men of other countries can do in athletic competition, in the various events—whether in the footraces, the shotput, the pole vault, or whatever other events may be scheduled. So these games will bring a great lift to the young people of our own country, as well. Of course, the the games will also add immeasurably to the great reservoir of good will.

Furthermore, I hope that many of the athletes who come to our country will win. Winning will be of great importance to them and to their countries; and the names of the winners will be emblazoned in the headlines of the newspapers in Rio de Janeiro, Buenos Aires, and the other great cities to the South of us. Mr. President, what a homecoming the winners will receive.

I can think of nothing better for young people and the development of their energies than to participate in these games.

Mr. President, Chicago is the natural place to hold the games. Chicago is a center of transportation, and is a great sports center. Chicago is the home of two great professional football teams, the Bears and the Cardinals. Chicago is also the home of two great professional baseball teams—the Cubs and the White Sox. They have been playing a long, long time. I remember that when I was a youngster in knee pants I used to watch baseball scores coming from Chicago. The fine athletes who attend Northwestern University are there. All in all, Chicago is a great, natural sports center.

Of course, Soldiers Field is located in Chicago. That field is large enough to accommodate the very great convocation of people will will be interested in the games. Soldiers Field will be festooned, decorated, and lighted. The celebration will be one of the great celebrations to be held, and, in my judgment, it will never be forgotten.

The $500,000 the bill authorizes to be appropriated will be nothing more than Federal participation. My colleague, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], has already pointed out the cost of the facilities which will be a charge upon the local authorities of Chicago. But there will be other charges which are not so apparent. For instance, consider the large number of extra policemen who will have to be used for traffic-control purposes, because the city will be filled with visitors when the games are held. There will also be a ceremonial dinner. Someone has to pay for all these things—either the city or the county or the State of Illinois. There are many hidden charges, which we are glad to undertake. In short, the $500,000 will be only a modest appropriation to help defray the cost of lodging, food, and transportation. I do not believe it is too much.

When we went before the Foreign Relations Committee one of our very dear and distinguished colleagues said, "Well, here come those two economists. They have been trying to balance the budget, and now they want $500,000."

Incidentally, Mr. President, before I forget it, let me say that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] has charged me with stating—in case he could not be present at this time—that he would be against the bill. So, in all good grace, I must say to the Senate that he is against it. I hope he is the only one who is against it—although certainly it is his privilege to be against it. So, Mr. President, if he is unable to be present today, the RECORD will very dutifully and circumspectly note for my esteemed colleague, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], and for his beloved constituents, that he does not want the $500,000 appropriation to be authorized.

Mr. President, this request is only for Federal participation. I believe that if my colleagues ever have a chance to see a summation of all the expenditures which will be made by the citizens of the city, and by the city itself, and by the county and by the State, they will find that the total will be very great, indeed, and that in proportion to the total the amount we now request will be very small.

So I hope very much the bill will be passed.

Certainly I shall not ask for a record vote; I do not think one is necessary. I trust that in the interest of conserving time a record vote will not be taken.

Let me state that I have cleared this matter with the Bureau of the Budget. I like to be very circumspect in my conduct in the field of economy; so I talked to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to ascertain whether this item was cleared; and it was.

I also talked to the State Department, to see whether this proposal has their approval; and it does.

So I think we find ourselves on good ground with respect to the normal budget procedures of government, in making our request in connection with this matter.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Can the Senator from Illinois advise us for how many young men or young men and young women the appropriation envisages their board will be paid?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The number has been figured out, and probably it is only an estimate. I believe it will run into the thousands. So something must be done. I believe they are allowed $3 a day; but we know what prices are today. So something must be done to ease their lot.

I am reminded of the days when I was on a high school football team, and when we journeyed with the team, and had to count our nickels and our pennies. Of course we always used a bus for transportation, and we always took care of our own meals. In those early days that seemed to be a burden, even in the case of a youngster in high school, to whom a penny or a nickel was almost as big as the moon coming up over Rockaway Beach. There was no inflation in those days and for a nickel one could buy in a butcher shop a bone for soup for a fairly large family.

Mr. LONG. I hope the reception the young people from Latin America will receive in our country will be as favorable as the reception accorded our young people when they visited the countries to the south. I have noticed that often the hosts have paid perhaps more than they could afford, in order to make a good impression. So I hope that when the visiting athletes return to their own countries, they will not take with them the conclusion that we did far less for them than they had a right to expect.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Precisely so. I am sure our young people were well received in Buenos Aires, and certainly we should do a good job in this case. Youngsters are at the impressionable age, and we want them to be favorably impressed.

Incidently, Mr. President, not the least important in connection with such an affair are the decorations. It will cost a considerable amount to decorate a place the size of Soldiers Field. For instance, I noticed that when the President of Ireland was in Washington, soon after the parade, almost all the Irish flags disappeared; people took them. So the District of Columbia was that much out of pocket. In short, the decorations for these games will not be the least of the items of cost.

So I trust that this measure will be passed expeditiously, and that we shall take prompt steps in connection with the necessary appropriations, so that these games will be made one of the greatest successes ever held in this hemisphere.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The bill (H.R. 2575) was passed.

Mr. DOUGLAS subsequently said: Mr. President, if it is in order, I should like to move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which H.R. 2575 was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is informed that that may be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask unanimous consent that I may make a motion to reconsider the vote by which H.R. 2575 was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

TELEVISION TRANSMISSION FACILITIES IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 52, Senate bill 12.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read by title, for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 12) to expedite the utilization of television transmission facilities in our public schools and colleges, and in adult training programs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 12) to expediate the utilization of television transmission facilities in our public schools and colleges, and in adult training programs, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with an amendment, at the top of page 4, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 7. No application for any grant under this Act may be accepted by the Commissioner of Education after the day which is five years after the date of enactment of this Act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary to assist the States and certain organizations therein to establish or improve television broadcasting for educational purposes, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, by providing for the establishment and improvement of television broadcasting facilities.

SEC. 2. Any agency or officer, or organization in a State, described in clause (b) (2) of this section, which is establishing or improving television broadcasting facilities, may receive a grant as authorized in this Act to cover the cost of such establishment or improvement by—

(a) making application therefor in such form as is prescribed by the United States Commissioner of Education; and

(b) providing assurance satisfactory to the Commissioner of Education—

(1) that the necessary funds to operate and maintain such facilities will be available;

(2) that the operation of such facilities will be under the control of (a) the agency or officer primarily responsible for the State supervision of public elementary and secondary schools, (b) a nonprofit foundation, corporation, or association organized primarily to engage in or encourage educational television broadcasting, (c) a duly constituted State educational television commission, or (d) a State controlled college or university; and

(3) that such facilities will be used only for educational purposes.

SEC. 3. Upon determining that an agency or officer or an organization has satisfied the requirements of section 2 of this Act, the Commissioner of Education is authorized to make a grant to such agency, officer, or organization in such amount as is determined by the Commissioner to be reasonable and necessary to cover the cost of such establishment or improvement of facilities. An agency or officer or an organization may receive one or more grants under the provisions of this Act, but the total amount of such grants for television broadcasting facilities in any State shall not exceed $1,000,000. Such grants shall be made out of funds appropriated for the purposes of this Act, and may be made in such installments as the Commissioner deems appropriate.

SEC. 4. As used in this Act the term "establishing or improving television broadcasting facilities" means the acquisition and installation of transmission apparatus necessary for television (including closed-circuit television) broadcasting, and does not include the construction or repair of structures to house such apparatus, and the term "State" means the several States, the District of Columbia, and the Territory of Hawaii.

SEC. 5. The Federal Communications Commission is authorized to provide such assistance in carrying out the provisions of this Act as may be requested by the Commissioner of Education.

SEC. 6. Nothing in this Act shall be deemed (a) to give the Commissioner of Education any control over television broadcasting, or (b) to amend any provision of, or requirement under, the Federal Communications Act.

SEC. 7. No application for any grant under this Act may be accepted by the Commissioner of Education after the day which is five years after the date of enactment of this Act.

MINERAL RIGHTS IN CERTAIN HOMESTEAD LANDS IN ALASKA

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, during recent weeks Americans have followed with great interest the trek of a group, calling themselves the Fifty-niners, to settle in the new State of Alaska. These venturesome people represent the first spontaneous, unsponsored American homesteading group—and I emphasize the word "group"—in over half a century. They are, of course, only the most recent of many families who have gone individually to Alaska to help make it become the fastest growing and fastest developing area under the American flag.

Nearly 2 years ago national attention was focused on the particular area to which the Fifty-niners have now gone. The attention was caused by the Richfield oil strike on July 23, 1957, when in the very first well drilled on the Kenai Peninsula a substantial flow of petroleum was developed. Since that time, only 20 months ago, this area of great agricultural promise has become simultaneously Alaska's No. 1 oil-producing area.

Before 1957 the lands in this area were not classified as prospectively valuable for oil and gas. Homesteaders who had completed all the requirements under the homesteading laws were granted full patents; that it, title to both surface and subsurface rights. The U.S. Geological Survey, prior to the 1957 oil strike, carried these lands in their records as nonmineral in character.

The homesteaders who had valid and subsisting entries on July 23, 1957—the date of the oil strike—had come to the Kenai to develop their homesteads in the expectation that they would gain title to subsurface as well as surface rights.

Many of these homesteaders had spent as much as five, ten, and fifteen thousands dollars in developing their 160-acre tracts of land. Even more important, they had spent long hours of hard work, hard in a degree which would be understood only by those settling raw land, and had made many personal sacrifices in an effort to carve farms and homes out of a wilderness.

According to the Department of the Interior, approximately one-third of these homesteaders whose entries were pending at the time of the oil discovery have now "proved up" on their lands and have submitted final proof to secure patents. Several of these have been waiting for more than 20 months. Now they have been told by the Secretary of the Interior that they must sign waivers to the oil and gas rights within a certain number of days or get off the land, forfeiting all their rights there as required by the 1922 Alaska homesteading statute.

I recently asked the Secretary of the Interior to extend the deadline for the signing of waivers. This request was granted so that the Alaska delegation in Congress might investigate the possibility of proposing legislation to remedy this unusual situation. With my colleagues in Senate and House, I have spent several months looking into the matter, and I have had several meetings with officials of the Interior Department in seeking a solution. These officials have agreed with me that the Alaska case is a special one, special primarily because of the long administrative delays which have ensued in the issuing of patents to the homesteaders. One such official has characterized this special situation as "a hearts and flowers case," a situation which properly evokes great sympathy and calls for justice.

The 1922 Alaska Homesteading Act is essentially the same as the original homestead act signed by Abraham Lincoln to promote prairie settlement in 1862. As Benjamin Hibbard wrote in 1924 in his "History of the Public Land Policies," immediately apparent is the act's "utter inadaptability to the parts of the country for which it was not designed."

The 1922 act, in many respects, is unsuited to the land conditions of Alaska. Its various requirements are admittedly somewhat arbitrary—representing more or less an obstacle course or endurance test ritual, a cross between trial by ordeal and schoolboy hazing. Be that as it may—and I hope that our homesteading laws soon will be revised with a view to their modernization and liberalization—something should be done to solve this present knotty problem, as the Acting Governor has described the situation on the Kenai Peninsula.

The homesteaders who entered these nonmineral lands prior to 1957 had no way of knowing that the Geological Survey would change the classification of these lands, an action which under existing law would prevent their securing subsurface rights to what they have long since come to look upon as their land.

These homesteaders entered the land in good faith. They entered the land to develop it for farms and homes, and I believe the Congress will want to see that justice is done in their behalf.

I have prepared a bill which would provide the granting of subsurface as well as surface rights to the Kenai homesteaders who had begun to prove up on their tracts prior to the date in 1957 when oil was first discovered in Alaska. The bill applies only to these Kenai homesteaders, numbering about 200 in all, and the few others in a similar position elsewhere in Alaska as a result of the general reclassification in 1957 of all sedimentary lands in the Territory—now a State—as prospectively valuable for oil and gas.

This bill does not apply to homesteaders who made entries after that date in 1957, for indeed, they were put on notice by the oil strike that their titles would be granted subject to the oil and gas reservations required by the 1922 law.

The few homesteaders who have already waived their subsurface rights would be restored those rights by quitclaim from the Federal Government.

Those who have submitted acceptable final proof, but have not yet waived, would be given full patents—that is, patents without reservations.

The remaining homesteaders who were on the land prior to July 27, 1957, and who have yet to submit final proof, would be excused from the necessity of waiving their oil and gas rights.

I introduce a bill on this subject and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD, together with a few letters, representative of scores of such letters I have received from homesteaders in Alaska in regard to the problem encompassed by the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1670) to provide for the granting of mineral rights in certain homestead lands in the State of Alaska, introduced by Mr. GRUENING, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States hereby quitclaims as of the date of this Act or as of the date of issuance of patent, whichever is later, to the patentee or to his lawful heirs if title to the lands prior to the date of this Act had by devise or succession passed out of the patentee, all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to oil and gas deposits in lands in the State of Alaska patented to homestead entrymen pursuant to homestead entries which were valid and subsisting on July 23, 1957.

SEC. 2. Nothing in this Act shall affect the validity of any lease issued under the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437; 30 U.S.C. 181 and following), as amended, or any rights arising thereunder, or any of its terms and conditions except that quitclaim under that terms of this Act of any oil and gas deposit covered by such a lease shall vest in the grantee all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to such lease, including the right to all rentals, royalties, and other payments accruing after the date of quitclaim and including any authority that may have been retained by the United States to modify its terms and conditions.

The letters presented by Mr. GRUENING are as follows:

Senator ERNEST GRUENING,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR GRUENING: I am hesitant about writing you at this time, knowing full well how busy you are with the opening of Congress. However, as the Interior Department—namely our friend, Mr. Seaton—is pressuring us homesteaders with a 90-day time limit to surrender our rights to the oil trusts or get out of Alaska, it is urgent that any action which can remedy the situation be taken at once. I am but one of 200 to 500 homestead cases in the Anchorage Land Office in a similar category.

I first came to Alaska in 1936 and have resided here ever since except for time served in the Armed Forces overseas. In the spring of 1955, I received my first opportunity to homestead in the Matanuska Valley, which I did. Using my veterans rights I submitted my final proof papers 7 months later in the spring of 1956—before the Kenai oil strike. With full faith in the justice of our homestead laws I had at this time invested $7,000 in improvements and cultivated 20 acres of land on my entry. According to land office circulars a veteran is supposed to receive his patent immediately following submission of such a showing. The original geological report showed my entry as not prospectively valuable for oil or gas and there was no reason to believe that I would not receive full rights as all previous homesteaders in Alaska had done.

In July 1956 the land office suspended issuance of all homestead patents. (This was evidently a deliberate stall for time until the Interior Department could find some legal means of taking away our oil rights. No mention was ever made in the Anchorage Land Office of the 1922 law which Mr. Seaton's men finally came up with when we originally settled on our land.) And as I still had faith in due process of law I was content to wait for my patent to be processed through the red tape of the land office, meanwhile trying to develop a farm out of a wilderness entry.

Senator, today, 3 years after submitting final proof on my entry and with approximately $15,000 improvements and 80 acres of cleared land, I received a letter from the Anchorage Land Office stating that I must sign a waiver to my oil and gas rights within 90 days or be kicked off the land that I have spent my life's savings and 4 years of hard work developing. If I sign the waiver, the oil companies will be able to drill wells, build roads, pipelines, pumps, etc., in my fields or elsewhere on my property with no recompense for property damage.

I can only hope that you can visualize my feelings and the feelings of other homesteaders whose patents were held up deliberately by Mr. Seaton's Department until they could sell us down the river. I do not believe that any Alaskan is against development of the oil industry but with 365 million acres of land in this great State, I, for one, do not believe that they are justified in grabbing the 2,000 or so acres involved in these homestead patents.

We can only ask as pioneers who entered upon the land in good faith for help. If possible, get some legislation passed in this session of Congress giving full rights to any settlers who entered upon land in Alaska at least before the Kenai oil strike.

We farmers know full well the terrific workload placed upon the shoulders of our representatives in Washington, D.C. However, you men, Senator, stand alone, our last hope against the great oil trusts in the opposite party. Any action which you could possibly take will be appreciated back home. I am enclosing a copy of the land office ultimatum.

Sincerely,

DONALD CHURCH,
Homestead Entry,
Anchorage 029582.

Hon. ERNEST GRUENING,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: A few days ago I received a notice from the Bureau of Land Management stating I have to sign a mineral waiver before I can get patent to my homestead, No. 031504, original S½ NE¼, NW¼ SE¼, section 28, and No. 032296, additional SW¼ NW¼ section 27, Township 5 North, Range 10 West, Seward Meridian.

I filed on these lands November 1955. I received my notice of allowance December 1955. At this time it was classified as agriculture lands. We completed our required residence in 1956. We cleared and cultivated over 20 acres, built a nice house. The Bureau of Land Management had made a field check and given a favorable report, and I filed final proof in September 1957. At this time the latest Geological Survey report classified this land as agricultural. The land office here still gave us to understand that we would get our mineral rights. On February 1958 I received my notice for publication (copy enclosed), in which the manager of the land office states that if no protest is filed during the period of publication or 30 days thereafter, final certificate would be issued. We have been waiting for this certificate for over 1 year. In July 1958 the land office requested a Geological Survey report, 10 months after we filed final proof. Now we receive this notice that if we don't sign a waiver on mineral rights or petition for reclassification (which must be supported by geological or other data) within 90 days our homestead will revert back to the Government.

We have acted in good faith and have met all the requirements up to this point. We have invested over $5,000, plus time and labor of myself and family, valued at over $10,000. If I sign a waiver of mineral rights, an oil company can lease these rights from the Government for about $40 and at any time they can come on any part of my homestead as they choose, without my permission, and not be liable for any surface damages whatsoever. It's like buying a house and paying for it, then the seller telling you he has kept a set of keys and is reserving part of the house in case his mother-in-law or some of his friends want to move in with you.

The homesteaders have petitioned the Government through the Alaska Governor's office to be able to lease the mineral rights on their own homesteads so that they will have jurisdiction of their own land. In this way the Government won't be out any lease money.

I would like to further develop my homestead so I can make a living on it, and this I cannot do, as I can't get financial assistance until I can get title to the land. This has been held up for more than a year now. I am intending to file an appeal. A good many homesteaders who filed prior to the oil discovery are in this same predicament.

Your assistance and advice in this matter will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

LOREN M. HEATH.

SPENARD, ALASKA.

COHOE, ALASKA.

DEAR MR. GRUENING: The oil rights of the Kenai homesteaders have been challenged on the basis of the amount of revenue the State will lose if legislation is passed allowing the homesteader to retain his oil rights. This sum is represented to be in the millions of dollars.

Let us examine the contributions of the homesteaders that are affected by the department of Geological Survey's ruling. What is the value of their homesteads to the State:

There are over 100 homesteaders on the Kenai Peninsula who filed on homesteads before the Swanson Creek oil well was drilled. However, as an example, let us determine the contribution of only 100 homesteaders. The cost of proving up on a homestead in the Kenai area has consistently averaged $15,000 per 160 acres. On this basis, 100 homestead families have pumped $1½ million into the economy of the State on proving up alone.

The Department of Agriculture from studies made in Alaska has advised us that the average expenditure to bring a farm in Alaska into production is $50,000. A farmer, in order to pay off his capital investment, must gross one-third of his investment to pay off the principal and realize a living wage each year. On this basis, the contribution 100 homesteads will make to the economy of Alaska figures out at $1,660,000 per year on a $5 million investment.

The round robin effect of this much money pumped into the economy of an area is hard to evaluate in the amount collectible in tax dollars. If we were to follow the path of a stay-in-Alaska dollar that remains in circulation, its tax potential becomes astronomical.

Let us say that the farmer buys a pound of seed from the feed store; the storekeeper, in turn, uses the dollar to purchase gasoline; the station-owner uses the dollar to buy medicine from the druggist and so on through a hundred transactions over the period of a year. Each transaction adds to the gross sales of the merchant on the taxable wage dollar of the worker. Each transaction is a possible avenue of tax revenue. It is not inconceivable that this dollar will return 100 percent of its value in tax revenue to the State over the period of the year.

Let us take a brief look at oil as an avenue of revenue on homestead lands. The department of Geological Survey in the geological report of this area shows tertiary deposits starting at Homer and extending northward; another tertiary deposit originates in the Swanson Creek area and goes southward. In this report, they state that the occurrence of oil is not probable in these formations.

Standard Oil, in their advertisement in the Juneau Independent, states that the average number of oil wells drilled in a proven field is 1 to 320 acres.

The Kenai oilfield, on the basis of the known formations, is broken up by the upheaval of the land to the extent that most of the oil is probably concentrated in pockets. The average depth of wells driven so far in this area, is more than 12,000 feet. Wells this deep, by the law of economics, require more land than the 320 acres. In this type of formation, and at the depth the oil formation lies, the wells drilled on the Kenai will, in all probability, be concentrated over known pockets of oil and be spaced at wide intervals.

The wells driven on the homesteader land affected by the department of Geological Surveys classification, will be very small. It is to the oil companies advantage to drill first upon Government land. We very much doubt that any wells will be drilled upon private land for years to come.

If we balance farm revenue against an uncertain income to the State from the relatively few oil wells that may be drilled on homestead lands we must realize that oil revenue is a one-shot affair. The State receives a small percentage from each gallon delivered on an uncertain flow of oil that has an unforeseeable life expectancy. Oil does not flow indefinitely; the farmer will be with us forever.

We homesteaders are not opportunists. We came here before oil was discovered. We have developed our homesteads because we have faith in the future of Alaska. We have had no Government help. We hardly need point out to you the huge expenditures used to stabilize the economy of the farmer in the other 48 States. Our Congress, in its wisdom, understands that the economy of our Nation lies within its productive farmlands. We, the citizens of the United States, learned a hard lesson by the great depression of the late twenties and the early thirties when the economy of the farmer fell far behind the productive capacity of industry. Our national economy did not recover until millions of dollars had been pumped into agriculture. Most of this aid to agriculture has not as yet become available to the Alaskan farmer. Any outside income a homesteader might derive from an oil industry in his area is that much less help he would require from the Federal Government.

When we balance all these factors and many more yet not apparent against an uncertain oil revenue, we have a bird in the hand that balances very favorably with the bird in the bush the State may never catch.

ALASKA ENTRYMAN'S RIGHTS ASSOCIATION.

Hon. ERNEST GRUENING,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR GRUENING: Please don't let anyone tell you that the State will lose large amounts of revenue if your bill goes through. The number of homsteaders who actually would obtain rights under a July 1957 deadline is small, not much over 150 by my reckoning. Loss to the State of royalty money is therefore infinitesimal since the land involved amounts to only about one-twentieth of 1 percent of the State's 103 million possible acres or one one-hundredth of 1 percent of total Alaska acres.

Any royalties received by these people would be plowed right back in development and provide additional tax base anyhow. I firmly believe that these homesteaders will put more back into Alaska than the dozen or so leaseholders who would receive the oil rights if the homesteaders do not.

In justice, the homesteaders who filed before the discovery deserve their rights.

Sincerely,

FRANCIS E. MULLEN.

SOLDOTNA, ALASKA.

DEAR SENATOR GRUENING: We do not consider ourselves a select group; we are a group of so-called little men who believe in our land and country and are fighting for what is rightfully ours.

The homestead laws definitely need adjusting as they are not stable enough for present times. * * *

The truth of the matter is that no waivers were sent out until after July 23, 1957, when Richfield struck oil. We believe that everyone that had an entry before this date is entitled to their rights.

We are sure that you will give this bill you are planning to introduce special and full consideration.

We on the Kenai are hopeful that this matter will be cleared up so that we can obtain our patents and plan our future and our children's on our land that we have worked so hard for and continue to help build Alaska to the great place it is intended to be.

Sincerely,

CHARLES G. MARTIN.

Hon. ERNEST GRUENING,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR GRUENING: My husband and I are homesteading and have been since 1956. We really appreciate your recent stand on oil and gas rights for the homesteader. Since we are about to apply for a patent we are very interested in this matter. As far as we know not only are we not granted oil and gas rights, but an oil company may come onto our land and drill any place they please without compensation to us. We have put a great deal of time, effort, and money into our homestead and don't wish to throw it to the winds; however, signing our name to a slip of paper that says an oil company more or less can do what they please with our land is too much for us to bear. We sincerely hope that you will be able to rectify this matter. I believe most any homesteader will agree that this would be very desirable.

We are proud of your work in Washington, both past and present.

Respectfully yours,

MRS. GLENN VLATER.

DEAR SIR: I was advised by my good friend, Heinie Snider, to write to you concerning my homesite problem.

We applied for this homesite under the act of May 26, 1934. It was officially filed April 17, 1953. We still do not have a title. When we applied for, advertised and paid for this homesite, there was no question about us not getting a clear title.

We never have understood the delay at the land office in sending us the title. As a result of the delay, we are asked to sign a release to gas and oil on the homesite before we can get a title.

Having lived on this site since 1918 and applying in good faith for ownership, it is disturbing to have recent developments that were not mentioned at the time we applied, cause us to sign the release or lose the site.

Homesite No. 012377, lots 16, 17 and 23. sec. 25, T. 21 S., R. 17 E., C.R.M.

MRS. BEN WATSON.

Mr. PHIL HOLDSWORTH,
Commissioner of Mines,
Juneau, Alaska.

DEAR SIR: * * * One block of ground in this area is held by an individual who now lives outside in another State. The State will receive 50 cents an acre on the ground he is able to tie up with all rights, making this ground barren and valueless.

If the homesteaders on that same ground get their oil rights, they will spend every nickel here, plus they will improve their property, giving this area and all of Alaska a more stable economy.

I have clear title with oil rights on my homestead, so this may or may not concern me. But I leased my ground to Standard Oil. My lease money went to a local lumberyard, for material to improve my new home. I want to see more and better homes in my own neighborhood. If these homesteaders around me do not get their oil rights, incidentally, those same homesteaders have been here since 1953 and 1954, then they cannot make improvements, they can do nothing, because under existing lease rules, the oil companies can drill in their backyard, front yard, or even living room. Can you say that this is progress? * * *

If these homesteaders, who have waited so long for patents get their oil rights, this will be monetary gain for them individually, and for the State in the increased value of improved ground and living conditions.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES ARNESS.

Hon. Senator GRUENING,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR GRUENING: What can you do to help the homesteaders who are certainly in need of your help and support, plus the support of everyone who is interested in seeing the right thing done?

We are all supposedly endowed with the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness in this new State of ours—the same as any other U.S. citizen.

Well, we are not living—we are existing. Can you live under the conditions that many of us homesteaders must put up with, when we feel we can't go ahead and make things more comfortable, because tomorrow we might have our homes ordered from under us? Those who already have these orders (people who have proved up but refused to sign a waiver and have never received the title that they have earned) are given 90 days to remove their improvements. Could you move 20 cleared acres, a cement foundation, a well, a cesspool, the fertilizer, and conditioners that it takes to prepare the ground for planting, not to mention the hardship and living conditions which we and our families went through because we were building a future?

A great many of us have earned our titles a year, 2 years, and even 3 or 4 years ago, and put in our final proof which was approved, but we have not been permitted to advertise. The land office tells us they are too busy to sign the papers, but if we sign a waiver they will take care of it immediately. Does our signing a paper make them less busy?

If we don't own the oil rights, why do we have to sign them away; and, if we do have the right to them, is it right and lawful to procure our signatures under duress with the threat of taking away our homes plus everything we have worked toward and setting our children out in the streets? Is this the American way?

To proceed to No. 2—liberty. Is this liberty?

Then comes the pursuit of happiness. True, it only gives us the right to pursue happiness. But we were doing this to the best of our ability by trying to build a comfortable home, when someone from the land office decides they will take it upon themselves to push us back down just to show they can—for they have the backing of our Government. Is this government of the people, by the people, for the people?

Supposedly the waivers turn the oil rights over to the Federal Government—but do they? There are applications for lease on all these lands, and when we sign a waiver the oil rights go to the speculators. True, they pay the Federal Government 25 cents an acre; but, if this is the issue, why can't we have the first opportunity to pay this 25 cents an acre on our own ground?

Sincerely,

BERTHA PORTER.

KENAI, ALASKA, March 31, 1959.

Senator ERNEST GRUENING,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: We, the homesteaders of the Kenai Peninsula, Alaska, would like to solicit your help in the solution of a problem we find we have, in conjunction with our homestead filings. Listed below are some of the factors involved.

When we filed and settled on the lands in question, we had one main concern, farming. We were given land allowances with all our rights, or releases from the Geological Survey office, and now have filled our part of the bargain with our Government. Now we cannot get our patents, because we will not sign oil waivers. We contend that all dates taken, concerning oil rights, would be the date we were given our land allowances, providing we completed our requirements. This is necessary as some, who had land-clearing problems, didn't file their final papers, for patent, until after oil was discovered, even though they had been in residence since 1953. It seems logical that the date of allowance be used, as that is the time in which the Government released the lands concerned, for the action to be taken and henceforth completed by the homesteaders. If the homestead claimant completes his part, the patent then becomes the last stage of his action, and mainly the legal document for his land.

An item of intense interest and discussion is the date in which the Geological Survey office claimed this land to be valuable for oil; which is the basis of all the actions taken against us, by the Bureau of Land Management. As of this date, the Geological Survey has done no field work in connection with oil discovery in this vicinity. The conclusion of, prospectively valuable, came after the discovery of oil on Swanson Creek, by an oil company, not by the Geological Survey, who had already issued reports that the area had no oil. If the Geological office is going to classify this area as feasible for oil prospecting, would it not be more fair and proper to give those with prior land allowances the first chance for oil rights? As it is, in many cases, the oil leases are given to second parties, who in turn will lease them to the various oil prospectors, who can then enter upon our lands and do as they please. Would it not be more in the American way of doing, if the people who have had the lands in question, who have fought through the past few years to build homes and improve their lands, who are all an exciting part of this new State of Alaska, were to be given their full rights?

Much concern has been raised by the possibility of the Federal and State Governments losing too much money on leasing and royalties. Several factors exist in this respect. First, there are only a few homesteads involved, and this makes up a very minute portion of the actual lease lands. The amount of money paid to the Federal and State Governments, for leases, will be far less than the amount that will be paid through income tax and property tax by those few homesteaders involved in the issue. Does it not seem logical that in the years to come, our State will lose millions in property tax alone?

It must be understandable that our lands, without oil rights, will in no way be as valuable and consequently as taxable, as the lands with the oil rights. Is there any assurance that the oil companies will lease these lands for any number of years? Nevertheless, it is a fact that we the people will pay property tax for generations to come. Will not this offset the amount the State may expect to lose? Then comes the moneys paid for the leases, to resident landowners with oil rights. Undoubtedly a large portion of their revenue will be spent here in Alaska. This will give a greater spending power to those who are a part of our State and consequently be of a great help in making our statehood a success. Those of us who are attempting to carry out a farming policy, can be expected to invest further in bettering our homes and lands. Let us be every mindful that this will also greatly add to our national defense and help strengthen our country as a whole. As we improve our lands, we improve our State, also have more taxable property, thus adding to our State treasury. It must be remembered, too, that an individual can borrow money on the valuation of his property. Lands without oil rights will be of much less value, thus restricting the loan valuation, and impairing the progress of the landowner.

We are all hopeful that there has been a misinterpretation of the law of 1922. That this law, if necessary, be amended to give the oil rights to those who had land allowances, before the date used by the Geological Survey office, as the date of oil discovery. This amendment would need only apply to Alaska or the Kenai Peninsula.

We, the homesteaders on the Kenai Peninsula, Alaska, feel certain that our Government of the people, by the people, and for the people will not let us down. That our Congress and our President will come forth, in this issue, giving us the rights which we have earned—our patents, including all our rights.

Sincerely,

ALEXANDER MCFARLAND ROSS.

Senator ERNEST GRUENING,
Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, Washington, D.C.

DEAR ERNEST: * * * In the circulation of the enclosed letters, 99.5 percent of the people voiced their indignation and expressed their desire that your legislation to benefit the homesteader should be passed.

Since we are working against time, the area of Kenai-Soldotna-Cohoe, and Kasilof were only covered. It is my belief that had we the time to cover the whole Kenai Peninsula of Alaska that the voters would overwhelmingly express the same attitude.

Copies of this enclosed letter from the people are going to Senator Bartlett, Acting Gov. Hugh G. Wade, Representative Ralph J. Rivers, and to Representative Allan Pettersen in Juneau.

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER P. SHADURA.

KENAI, ALASKA.

Many responsible officials including Interior Department officials have admitted the need for a change in the law (act of March 8, 1922) in order to give fair and just consideration to the settlers of the land. The land area involved in this controversy is very small compared to the Federal-owned lands. Should the mineral ownership dispute be adjudicated in favor of the homestead entryman resultant loss of revenue to the State from the royalties on these homesteaded lands would be inconsequential. However, if the mineral rights are given the State or Federal Government, a tremendous betrayal and loss will be perpetuated upon the homesteader, who worked diligently and expended great sums of money in performing his requirements to earn equitable title to the entered lands. There are many homesteaders involved in this situation because of BLM bottlenecks not attributable to the homesteader but which delayed BLM actions in processing final proof submittal which should have resulted in issuance of patents without oil and gas reservations.

When Senator ANDERSON, of New Mexico, attempted to introduce an amendment to H.R. 8054, bill passed by the 85th Congress, which amendment proposed to raise the rentals on Federal oil and gas leases in Alaska from 25 to 50 cents per acre and to make that rental increase retroactive and apply to all pending Federal oil and gas leases, a tremendous protest was made by the oil institutions, and Federal oil and gas lease applicants who rightfully argued that they applied for leases on hundreds of thousands of acres of Federal land and planned development on those lands because of a Government-sponsored incentive that such lease could be acquired for a first 3-year rental of 25 cents per acre. The Insular Affairs Committee with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior recommended that the increase should not be made retroactive because to do so would be a betrayal to the terms and conditions under which the U.S. Federal Government offered to lease its lands to U.S. citizens and companies. We agree that that decision was wise and morally just and saved oil companies many thousands of dollars which would have been required of them to pay had the rental increase been made retroactive. Therefore the oil company wasn't victimized in the processing stage of an agreement with the Government.

Now the homesteader who has made entry upon his lands, builds homes, clears land, and performs his required duties to earn patent to his land has a very similar situation in that he performed his required duties with the governmental suggestions that he will gain ownership of the land and whatever mineral value is contained under his land excepting for coal and radioctive minerals. Using the above-mentioned rental increase proposal as an example: Why then, is it not just as unfair to change the land classification on an entryman performing his required duties, and through an outdated law deprive him of the rights and entitlement to his land under the conditions which the Government offered at the time he entered into his effort to earn patent.

As your constituents, we plead that you voice an immediate and vigorous protest to Mr. Holdsworth's recommendations and to encourage legislation to give the mineral rights to those homesteaders who had made entry and were expending money and energy in settling their lands before oil was found to exist on the Kenai Peninsula. If given the mineral rights, those homesteaders will lease their land to the oil companies and a more orderly and harmonious development of the oil and gas resources of the peninsula would result. Such development would benefit the homesteader, the State, and the oil companies alike. If the mineral ownership is reserved to the State resulting in the homesteader suffering surface damages from exploration without the benefit of the fruits from such exploration, a critical situation of confusion and trouble most certainly could jeopardize the success of oil and gas development on the Kenai Peninsula and all parties concerned would fail to benefit.

GARNISHMENT LAW OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, just before the Easter recess, Senator JOHNSTON of South Carolina introduced and I cosponsored a bill to repeal the garnishment law for the District of Columbia. I made a lengthy speech on the subject, which may be found on page 5221 of the March 25 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. President, I firmly believe that the garnishment law of the District of Columbia is nothing more than a haven for the easy-credit stores which hoodwink customers into paying much more for the products on the basis that they can get easy credit. As a result, the customers are subjected to all types of hardships through garnishment proceedings.

I have in my hand an article from the Washington Star of April 10, 1959, which urges repeal of the garnishment law. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article be placed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GARNISHMENT LAW REPEAL URGED

The Congress Heights Citizens Association last night strongly opposed District garnishment laws.

It recommended that all laws holding employers responsible for collection of employees' debts should be annulled.

Charles W. Harris, president of Boilermaker Local 655, cited cases of four and five garnishments against one man. Current laws, he said allow a worker to jeopardize his job and to become unable to support properly his family.

The group protested the rezoning of a triangle of land at Nichols Avenue, Upson and First Streets S.E. for a filling station. A representative was chosen to oppose the petition at the zoning board meeting, 9:30 a.m. Wednesday.

Mark Hotrick, president, conducted the meeting in Congress Heights School, Nichols and Alabama Avenues S.E.

FARM LEGISLATION

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a GTA Daily Radio Roundup, dated April 7, 1959. It deals with the farm situation in North Dakota and the Middle West. The situation is rapidly deteriorating because of the inaction of the majority, which means two-thirds of the Senate now democratically controlled. Since the election—November, December, January, February, March, and now April—not even a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has reported a farm bill.

The planting season is over in the Midwest. Yet thousands of people who voted for candidates who were supporting a good farm bill have not had the satisfaction of knowing even what is proposed. My colleague from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] and I have announced time and again that we would support any good farm bill reported by the committee, and that we would vote to override a presidential veto in the event the President vetoed such a bill.

I want to say again that we relied upon the majority on the other side of the aisle. They have completely ignored the wishes of the voters in the Middle West.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A man who aspired to be President of the United States and didn't make it—but who continues to be a respected U.S. Senator—says this country needs a Federal Department of Consumers, just like we've got Departments of Labor and Commerce and Interior and Agriculture. He says he gets hundreds of letters that read: "I am in the red. Please help the forgotten consumer." One letterwriter says he bought a few groceries—and the bill came to $17.83.

This Senator, whom you will recognize as ESTES KEFAUVER, says that in popular parlance around Washington grocery stores' cash register tapes are known as consumer stationery. Consumers there think food prices are too high.

Well, most people will agree that a Federal Department of Consumers might be a good idea. Consumers as a group are not adequately represented. Such a department might be in a position to explain to consumers better than it is being done now that food prices are only remotely related to farm prices. It could point out that consumers really owe a vote of thanks to farmers for doing more than anybody else to hold down the cost of living.

A few spokesmen are telling that story now. It's in the most recent issue of the Farmers Union Herald, which is in the mails now on its way to 250,000 upper Midwest rural mailboxes. Washington columnist, Porter Hedge, says that farmers are giving consumers a sensational bargain in foods, including meats. But a lot of city people don't know about it. It is being screened, Porter Hedge writes, "by a curtain of larger and wider price margins." As a result, bargain basement farm prices don't show up over the supermarket checkout counters.

"But that's been going on for years," he says. It's nothing new. But right now these bargain basement farm prices are in the spotlight again because eggs at the farm in the Midwest have dropped to as low as 19 and 20 cents a dozen, and that's 10 to 15 cents lower than a year ago.

Porter Hedge also tells about the bargains that farmers are turning out in poultry and pork and beef. It's all explained in the April 6 Farmers Union Herald. If you don't get the Herald just drop us a postcard here at GTA in St. Paul and we'll see that you get a copy.

The Washington farm writer sums up the situation by revealing that the farm value of the food—a typical consuming family buys in a year—went down $55 between 1952 and 1958. But the retail price went up $86. Add up those two figures and you'll see that marketing charges have increased $141, with both farmers and consumers paying the bill.

Well, is there an answer? Perhaps the department of consumers suggested by Senator KEFAUVER would be able to explain the situation better to consumers. But would it be able to lower the high cost of marketing and thus give consumers lower prices?

As far as farmers are concerned, their contribution is already very large. Raising farm prices to fair levels, which is all that farmers ask in return for their contribution of abundance, would have very little effect on food prices. But for the long pull, remember that your bushels of grain and dollars of business work for you when you put them to work GTA the co-op way.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TELEVISION TRANSMISSION FACILITIES IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 12) to expedite the utilization of television transmission facilities in our public schools and colleges, and in adult training programs.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, Senate bill 12 deals solely with educational television. A similar bill, with the exception of one amendment, passed the Senate unanimously last year. The House held hearings on the bill near the end of the session; but the bill was caught in the legislative jam, although, so far as I know, with the exception of some minor amendments on the House side, which, after conferences with the chairman of the committee, Mr. HARRIS, we would have accepted, it would have passed the House. There was very little objection to it.

In order that that may not happen again in connection with this important measure, I proceeded to introduce the bill as one of the first bills of the session, as is indicated by its number, 12, in the hope that we could expedite passage of the bill and send it over to the House, in order that this very important program might proceed.

Last year the bill was sponsored, both actually and impliedly, by practically every member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, including former Senator Bricker, of Ohio. This year the sponsorship is under the direction of myself and the distinguished ranking minority member, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL].

S. 12 is a modest and somewhat simple proposal with a tremendous and far-reaching impact on the general public. This legislation is intended to expedite and accelerate the use of television in our schools, colleges, and training programs in each of the several States, the District of Columbia, and what will be the new State of Hawaii. The bill proposes to make grants not in excess of $1 million to each State agreeing to provide the land, buildings, and the costs of operating and maintaining the television facilities placed into operation. In other words, there must be a great deal of local participation before any applicant will be considered for a Federal grant. The grants authorized by the bill are simple and direct. The money is to be used exclusively for the purchase of actual equipment, and facilities required in educational television projects. The Federal Government intervention ends at that point. It is shut off at that point. There is no intention whatsoever to determine the kind of programs, the type of circuits, or anything pertaining to the program of education by the new medium.

Seven years have passed since the Federal Communications Commission wisely reserved 242 TV channels or approximately 12 percent of all television channels in the United States for noncommercial educational use. In that period 37 educational stations located from Massachusetts to California and from Minnesota to Texas have been constructed and 22 are in various phases of construction. In the case of many of them great difficulties are being experienced in obtaining financing. Thus a total of only 59 stations have been constructed or begun, out of the 242 channels set aside.

Despite the strides which educators have been making in establishing educational stations in the United States, only a small part of the total potential has been achieved. Vast numbers of problems and obstacles have beset educators and laymen throughout the United States in their efforts to activate the unused channels reserved for education. The failure of the educators to use these channels is not the result of lack of interest, desire, planning, or zeal on their part. The largest problem which faces them and others desirous of using television for educational purposes is the lack of adequate funds to pay for the basic installation of television facilities.

But something else happened. In the spectrum there are available so many very high frequency channels. Beyond that, in the ultra high field, which requires a different kind of set, there are many channels. But these channels are at a premium. There was quite a fight 7 years ago to have them set aside for educational purposes. No one knows better than does the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] how much trouble it is possible to have with very high frequency channels and ultra high frequency channels, and the scarcity of channels. So when a channel is idle for 7 years it is only natural that those who want to go into commercial television work and to serve the public in commercial television, which has done a good job throughout the United States in most places, should attempt to pry loose the unused channels. The argument is always used, "For 7 long years this channel has been idle." That feature enters into the problem. One of the real purposes of the bill is to deal with that aspect.

Experience has demonstrated that once a television station has been built State legislatures, local educational systems, and local communities at large, have raised funds to produce the programs over these stations. In other words, when channels are not being used, the argument is to the effect that, "This is a new fangled idea." There has been quite an educational campaign to convince the people, and to obtain public support for the program, to the end that legislatures will provide appropriations and State universities will participate, in the effort to convince the public, which supports these institutions, that this is meant to be a supplement to education, and not a substitute therefor. So there has been a great deal of difficulty; but we have found that in every case in which such stations have been started, the value of the program becomes so apparent, once they get off the ground, as it were, that none of the communities, State universities, or States themselves want to see educational television die out. We feel—and there is ample testimony in the RECORD to support that feeling—that unless the Federal Government takes the initiative by contributing to construction costs, thereby forcing a breakthrough in this field, I am afraid a great educational potential will be lost.

We have heard many times about the existing and growing problems of education. We know that there is a serious shortage of teachers and buildings and that each of these shortages grow with each passing day. The use of television facilities in our schools and colleges and adult training programs will strike directly at these existing shortages. We all know television is a powerful means of communications. Its message can be transmitted live or by use of training films. Current research and experimentation, as well as local and regional planning, reveal unlimited potentialities for the future in educational television.

This bill is intended to launch our country generally upon the path of bringing into our educational system the tremendous advantage and opportunity afforded by the television medium. Its costs in actual dollars is modest. Its rewards are virtually unlimited when compared to the problems existing in the educational field today. Once these facilities are constructed, I am sure the States can carry the load.

It is to be recalled that in the last Congress, as I have said before, I introduced S. 2119, which was generally the same as the pending bill. However, whereas the bill, passed last year contained no time limitation, the pending bill does limit the time to 5 years.

I do not intend to make a further lengthy statement on the bill, because the hearings last year and this year adequately cover the need for the proposed legislation. However, I merely wish to quote the statement of a leading educational leader, Dean Gordon Sabine, of Michigan State University, who said:

> The educational needs of the United States have so far outstripped the educational capabilities of the Nation that we must have educational television to help us win the fight to educate a whole people. Without it, we surely are defeated.

The committee reported the pending bill unanimously and added one short amendment which would terminate the effect of the legislation after 5 years, because we feel that this is an important subject which Congress should have an opportunity to evaluate from time to time. I cannot too strongly emphasize the importance of the proposed legislation.

Since last year many things have happened in this field. I recommend to all Members of the Senate a reading of the full report of the committee, because of the many exciting new things which have happened in this new area. We know that we are short of teachers of science in our high schools. Under an educational TV system some of the great scientists of the United States and of the world will devote their time and energy to make a training film from which every youngster will get the benefit of a lecture given by those whom we regard as among our great men in this new field.

In the field of music that is likewise true. The same thing can be said of the field of art and the field of finance.

I note that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] is on the floor. He has taken a deep interest in this subject. I made it a point to inquire last week while I was in my home State about educational TV at our university. It comes to only one town. Only one program was televised, and that was a class in Russian. It was advertised, but it was necessary for a participant to go to the university and get an enrollment slip, with the hope that he would come back and take an examination, to find out how he was getting along. The university had so many requests that it could not accommodate the number of people who came to the registrar's office to register for the class in Russian.

Three weeks ago in New York City, on an educational TV program, I believe one conducted either by the college of the city of New York or Columbia University, it was stated that the program would consist of a series of training films on shorthand and typewriting. I believe that some 6,000 applicants showed up to get their enrollment slips. We are certainly faced with a great potential.

Hagerstown, Md., was selected as an experimental place for an educational TV program to supplement courses in the elementary schools. Everyone contributed to it, even the commercial networks. They published a TV guide for the benefit of the children, so they would know what was coming up next. All this supplemented the regular elementary courses. At the end of the year it was found that the students had advanced almost a whole grade in their studies.

At the University of Alabama and at Ohio State University it is possible now to take first year credits. That is particularly true at the University of Alabama. First year credits can be earned on a TV educational program, which has been instituted all over the State. In that way a farm boy or anyone else can go to the University of Alabama on first-year credits received on the TV program.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] and I asked how TV students

compared with the regular college students when they entered the sophomore class. We were told that both groups stood on about the same level. The TV students stood with the college students, so far as scholastic achievement was concerned.

Of course, I do not believe a TV educational program will be a substitute for solid education. However, it will supplement our regular educational programs in the schools and colleges. It is well worth while.

I know the question will be asked why we should give $1 million to each State. Obviously the State of Nevada would not need as much as the State of Washington or the State of New York. The State of Kansas would not have programs similar to those in the State of California.

The figure was chosen so as to get the program started. The construction program must be approved by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Office of Education, and also by the FCC on the engineering aspects.

Obviously the programs which will be produced will be small in the smaller States and greater in the larger States. The purpose of the bill is merely to get the program off the ground. I hope we can make a start on this long-delayed and long-overdue program in this great new educational field.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], whom I have been glad to join in the introduction of the pending bill. As was pointed out by the Senator from Washington, the bill is almost identical in form to the bill which was passed during the last session of Congress.

At that time the distinguished Senator from Ohio, Senator Bricker, and the distinguished Senator from Washington had much to do with presenting the bill to the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in the hearings, and supporting the bill on the floor.

Now we are discussing it after it has been reported by the committee.

I am glad to be associated in sponsoring this measure because of the many things which the Senator from Washington has brought out and the interest which has been manifested all over the country. Many of the points the Senator has mentioned with reference to the State of Washington and some of the other States are true also in my State of Kansas.

We are now well started in the fourth month of the 86th Congress, and already the cleavage has become sharp between those whose greatest fear is uncontrolled inflation and those who see the greatest hazard in an economy that does not expand at a fixed and regular rate each year.

I prefer to be classed with those who see danger in deficit spending and inflation. Nevertheless, there will be times when some spending will seem to me to be the prudent course and the best way of conserving values that are important to our way of life and our survival as a nation. The bill now before us (S. 12), the so-called educational TV bill, would authorize the kind of spending I approve—even at a time when money is relatively short.

During my service on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I have had the opportunity to follow the hearings on the allocation and use of educational television channels. This is a matter to which the Senator from Washington referred a moment ago. It has been most gratifying to note, year after year, the tremendous strides taken by those communities whose educational TV stations have actually gone on the air.

At the same time, it has been disappointing to observe that two-thirds of the people in the United States still have no access to educational television. At present, only a score of our great universities use television to meet their educational responsibilities. Of the many thousands of school systems in the United States, only about 150 have educational television even in their near future. For the rest, educational TV is probably many years away.

The failure to make more abundant use of educational television stems from no lack of confidence in its worth either on the part of educators or of others who have had the opportunity and occasion to evaluate it. The trouble is that not enough people know what educational television can do, and their voices are too small when budgets are put together. The inevitable consequence is postponement added to postponement. Meanwhile, children march through school, never to return to grades in which instruction has been thin and poor because of the lack of access to educational television.

To me, the great tragedy in lost educational opportunity lies in the impossibility of retrievement. The hours and years doled out to each of us can be spent but once. If by inaction or inadequate plan, we give too thin a fare to those for whose learning we hold responsibility, we fail in a way that we cannot make up, for what is lost is learning time.

Educational television is not primarily a way of making learning palatable. Neither is it primarily a way of lowering the cost per student. It is simply the best way open to us to improve the quality of education and make it universal. Television broadens the reach of the best teachers—even to remote rural schools and areas. It adds to the effectiveness of all teachers. It enriches curricula and introduces subject matter not otherwise available outside of great metropolitan centers.

As I see it, the bill before us is a kind of domestic point 4 program. It is a way of getting educational television operating, at least on a pilot plant basis, in all of the States at the earliest possible moment. The bill would not force-feed educational television to school systems which do not want it. It would not put the Federal Government into the business of prescribing course content, methods of teaching, qualifications of teachers, or structure of school systems. If enacted, it would simply give a helping hand, at a time when it is most needed, to schools, colleges, and other educational entities which are ready and willing to spend even more of their own money to get educational television going or expanded to meet their needs.

The substance of S. 12 was approved by the Senate in the second session of the 85th Congress. The bill at that time was S. 2119, which, as indicated by the distinguished Senator from Washington, was reported unanimously by the Commerce Committee despite adverse comment from the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

I mention that comment in particular because a similar comment has been received from the same Department on the current bill, S. 12. As a matter of fact, the comment on the bill before us gives every evidence of having been quilted from pieces of the previous one. The substance of the comment, in both instances, is that the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has no information to indicate that S. 12 is necessary to assure continuing development of educational television or that there is inability, without Federal help, to finance transmitting equipment.

I cannot quarrel with the HEW comment other than to say that it misses the point, as I understand the matter. I agree that educational television can grow and expand without Federal help. I even think it likely that most communities can, if put to the task, finance the purchase of transmitting equipment. Ultimately they will, but in the meantime, how many children will we have neglected? How many potential scientists will we have lost through failure to make televised courses in chemistry and physics available to students in thinly populated areas? They are entitled to those privileges.

Turning now to the budgetary approach, how much will S. 12 cost? If all the grants authorized are taken up within the 5 years stipulated in the bill, the total cost will be $51 million. I hope that all of the grants will be taken up, but there are obstacles that could result in the lapse of some of the authorized funds. A lot of thinking, planning, and local decisions must take place before an applicant can even be ready to file for a grant. Such decisions embrace commitments to provide sites, buildings, personnel, and operating and maintenance funds for educational TV.

As provided in the bill, an applicant may fall into any of the following categories: First, the applicant may be, in his State, the officer or agency primarily responsible for the State supervision of public elementary and secondary schools. In this class would fall State superintendents of public instruction, State boards of education, and the like. The second class is a relatively new type entity, a nonprofit foundation, corporation, or association organized primarily to engage in or encourage educational television broadcasting. Fitting this definition is such a group as the Greater Washington Educational Television Association, Inc.

The third class is a duly constituted State educational television commission. An example of such a body is the Alabama Educational Television Commission, whose general manager, by the way, testified during the hearings on S. 12.

The fourth and final class of applicant is a State controlled college or university.

The rate of spending under S. 12 would be determined not only by the time required by the various types of applicants to arrive at local plans and decisions but also by certain requirements that the Commission of Education is empowered to impose. Before he may make a grant, the Commissioner must determine that it is reasonable and necessary to cover the cost of acquiring and installing transmission apparatus and that it falls within the overall allocation of $1 million for the State from which the application comes. The Commissioner may make any grant in installments, if he deems it appropriate.

Aside from the delays which may be occasioned by the need for local decisions and by the processing in the Office of the Commissioner of Education, there will be additional delays in many instances because of the need to obtain a construction permit from the Federal Communications Commission for a reserved educational TV channel. It is most difficult, therefore, to predict the impact of this legislation upon the budget of a particular fiscal year other than to say that it is most unlikely that any great part of the authorized funds would be expended within the first year or two of operation under the grant authority.

No doubt those States which have already done most in the field of educational TV would be first to come forward with plans and applications for extension and improvement of the work already under way. I see no harm, however, in early grants to those areas which already have some educational television, because everything learned in this field immediately becomes part of a body of common knowledge readily available to others who want to follow the pioneers. Furthermore, work done in the pioneering areas trains people who can then fan out to assist in development of educational TV in new areas. That such diffusion of trained people has already taken place was indicated in the biographies of expert witnesses who testified during the hearings on S. 12. More of such diffusion will occur, and it will come faster, when funds authorized by S. 12 become available to the several States, the District of Columbia, and Hawaii.

In essence, Mr. President, the judgment each of us is called upon to make in connection with the pending bill is whether the expenditures it would authorize are ones it would be wise to postpone or to forego altogether. In my view, they have been postponed overlong already. If we are to make educational opportunity truly universal, if we are to give to our youth in their learning years and their creative years the breadth of education which it is within our power to give, we should, in my humble opinion, vote our approval of S. 12. When that has been done, we shall have taken a great step forward in the field of education.

Mr. President, my colleague on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the distinguished junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON], who is much interested in the bill and who did much work in this field, is unavoidably detained from attendance in the Senate this afternoon. I ask unanimous consent that a statement which he would have made as a part of this discussion had he himself been present today be printed at this point in the RECORD, and also that the exhibits which he would have submitted also be printed following his statement.

There being no objection, the statement and exhibits were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR COTTON

Television has the ability to provide more education for more people in less time than any instrument ever devised. But much of this potential is going to waste today, despite our urgent needs in education.

In the 10 years since television became an every day reality, it has proved to have two great powers beyond any other means of communication.

First, unlike any other means of communication, it has immediacy. Now a man can sit in his own living room and see the curve of the earth. He can see his own destiny being shaped, at the moment, on stage. All the stored-up treasures of the ages—science, music, literature, art, culture, can be brought before his eyes.

Television is the one instrument through which sleeping interest in science, chemistry, and the arts can best be aroused. It reaches homes where books are seldom read. It reaches homes where beauty is absent. The maze of tubes and wires behind the screen have the capacity to lift the intellectual level of a whole nation to new heights.

This is the potential at our disposal, if we are willing to make use of it.

Second, it has an exposure power, an attractive force greater than ever before known. The average American sits before that little square screen more than 3 hours a day, over 22 hours a week. He spends more time before it than on anything else except sleep and his work. Forty-two million families have spent more on TV sets than on anything else they own except their homes and cars.

This tremendous investment in time and money does bring them a good deal of education, but only occasionally or incidentally. Americans are studying such things as atomic physics, religion, and Russian on commercial TV, but usually at some time like 6:30 in the morning. The economics of commercial TV effectively prevent even the most education-minded station executive from providing broader fare at better hours. To stay in business, he must present the big-paying, big-drawing horse operas and the variety shows during the prime viewing hours. Despite its own real efforts, commercial TV simply cannot bring educational telecasting to its full bloom.

The contrast between the lusty, billion-dollar commercial TV industry and the puny educational TV establishment emphasizes the need for swift, effective, and even drastic measures to get ETV off the ground.

Twelve percent of the Nation's television channels have been reserved for noncommercial, educational use for the past 7 years. Only 36 of these 257 channels are now on the air. Twenty-four more stations have gotten construction permits from the FCC but are not yet broadcasting, and six applications are pending.

Furthermore, 191 of these reserved channels are going begging. They have no takers. Two-thirds of the people of the Nation have no chance to see an educational TV station. Only 20 of our great universities have a TV station to help them carry out their regular and adult education responsibilities.

Not only is the potential of ETV going to waste, it is in danger of being lost entirely because of the steady and increasing pressure to free these channels for commercial use. This is especially true of the 45 which are in the VHF band covering the keenly-sought channels from 2 through 13. The Federal Communications Commission has steadfastly refused to throw open these channels for commercial TV, but they can't hold off indefinitely, allowing scarce channels to remain dark and vacant.

This bill offers a means of lighting up these 191 channels and putting them to the best possible use. By making up to $1 million available to each State for the equipment and facilities needed for their ETV stations, it will be a galvanizing shock that can make the promise of ETV a down-to-earth reality.

It is one low-cost, high-yield, single-shot Federal spending program I can go for with enthusiasm.

Frankly, I haven't always felt this way about ETV. While I believed the channels should be used for the enlightenment of our people, young and old, and to relieve the monotony of the endless westerns on commercial TV, I had the mistaken idea that ETV was the frosting of education. I had the impression it provided the appetizer but not the main course—teaching current events, improving cultural backgrounds, and whetting the appetite of students and adults for the arts and sciences.

Hearings before our committee last year and again this year have left no doubts. The record is filled with specific examples of the benefits of educational TV. In Memphis 700 adults have learned to read and write; in Schenectady 4,000 are learning a foreign language at 6:30 in the morning; in Chicago 29,000 have enrolled and paid fees for a junior college course; in rural sections of Oklahoma science and mathematics are being brought to children in small schools who have never been taught them before; 1,200 classes in the Washington area receive a daily science lesson. The list is a long one.

One of the most striking things is that the achievements of ETV stations have been accomplished with an investment of $60 million, and almost half of this sum, $27 million, has come from a single private charitable foundation, the Ford Foundation. There is no question that ETV can do for our schools what the power loom did for the weaver. It offers new opportunities for better teaching at a saving in teachers and buildings.

In my own State, the New Hampshire Educational Broadcasting Council, composed of representatives of 19 schools and colleges, the State Department of Education of the Catholic Diocese, and the Association of School Superintendents, has been striving to put an ETV station on the air. In 1958, a citizens committee was successful in raising sufficient funds to match a grant from the Ford Foundation's Fund for Adult Education, and securing a construction permit for a station at Durham, N.H. WENH plans to be on the air within a few months, presenting its educational programs over channel 11. New Hampshire's other educational TV channel, 27 at Hanover, is still unused and unsought.

New Hampshire's share of the funds provided by S. 12 will be available for such things as improving the facilities of WENH, increasing its power and range, and installing other devices to bring its benefits to a wider number of viewers, as well as for lighting the darkness of channel 27. The full value of ETV will be a long time coming to New Hampshire, and most of the rest of the Nation, unless we seize the opportunity before us.

The time has come to put ETV on a firm basis. Passage of this bill will be a powerful and overdue move in the right direction.

UNIVERSITY OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
Durham, N. H., March 30, 1959.

Hon. NORRIS COTTON,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR COTTON: The University of New Hampshire educational television station, WENH–TV, sent out its test pattern from its tower site last week and will initiate its first program services June 1, with 3 or 4 hours of adult educational programing. The enclosure explains our plans for this project, carried on in cooperation with the other college and educational agencies of the State.

As you know, there is now pending Senate bill 12 (the Magnuson bill), which will provide up to $1 million to each State for educational television transmitting facilities. This could mean, of course, expanding our planned coverage, going to full power, and providing a genuinely statewide educational television service. In these ways, New Hampshire would benefit, even though we are about to get WENH–TV on the air from other minimal sources of support. For these reasons, we and all concerned with the station's future are much interested in the passage of the Magnuson bill again.

We are grateful for your assistance last year, and feel confident of its continuation. We invite you to tour our studio and transmitter facilities when you are in Durham.

Sincerely yours,

ELDON L. JOHNSON,
President.

JANUARY 28, 1959.

Citizens of New Hampshire will be served in their homes and schools by late spring through the facilities of WENH–TV, the State educational television station, located at the University of New Hampshire, Durham. Station manager Keith J. Nighbert is already making plans for early conferences with the New Hampshire Broadcasting Council, the Citizens Advisory Committee, and superintendents, teachers, and principals of the State. A statewide program survey will be conducted to determine what the people of this State would like to see in terms of program services on WENH–TV.

The educational television transmitter building, located on Saddleback Mountain, Deerfield, is now completed, with the tower antenna to be erected within the next 2 weeks. Studio and office located in the Memorial Union Building at the university are now being constructed and will be completed in about 3 months.

WENH–TV Chief Engineer Charles F. Halle has completed the hiring of his engineering staff. Program and production staff will be selected within the next few months.

Tentative plans for the station's program schedule indicate that about 2 hours of programs in the morning will be provided for in-school television lessons for the New Hampshire schools. Demonstrations of the in-school television service for teachers will be scheduled by the station in the late spring. This will be an opportunity to give teacher training and will allow schools to obtain, install, and adjust equipment for channel 11.

The engineering staff will welcome questions about the type of television equipment for schools and will be glad to supply the necessary information.

Adult programing will be telecast 3 or 4 hours each evening, Monday through Friday, when the station takes the air. A concerted effort will be made, Nighbert said, to attract and procure outstanding New Hampshire talent for the live programs to be produced by the station.

Services to the schools can be a major service with either supplementary experiences offered through the station or direct teaching of subject matter.

New Hampshire children may soon have the opportunity of having the State's outstanding art or music or science teacher coming into their classrooms daily. The school curriculum can be both broadened and strengthened through this new educational service. In-service training through our State colleges can provide valuable assistance to teachers in their homes or classrooms by providing them with college courses for credit or with demonstration lessons in the elementary and secondary curriculum.

Mr. Nighbert stressed the point that teachers and school administrators will make the decisions as to content of the in-school program services.

The staff of WENH–TV will strive to provide quality program services of significance to the people of New Hampshire. Our aim will be to make this station the "best station" in the Nation, Mr. Nighbert said.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD three articles, as follows: One entitled "There Is No Substitute for the Truth on the Air," written by John Crosby; one entitled "A 'Revolution' Is on the Way," also written by John Crosby; and one entitled "Global TV Is Coming," written by James L. Kilgallen.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WITNESS ETV—THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR THE TRUTH ON THE AIR

(By John Crosby)

ANN ARBOR, MICH.—"Gandhi demonstrated the power of the spirit over material things," declared the narrator in a film on the University of Michigan television's "Genius" series. "You could put his possesions into a shopping bag but he lived and died for the truth and therein lay his genius."

You might say that educational television has the same material weakness and spiritual strength Gandhi had. But educational television people don't always know where their strength and weakness lie. The most powerful educational TV shows I have seen here have been fairly simple declarations of truth—and all you need for that is a human being who knows what he's talking about and a camera.

For instance, one film on the university's "Understanding Our World" series is on the unpalatable subject of the behavior of our prisoners of war in Korea. The record is bad—very bad—but no attempt is made to pretty it up. After all, the university doesn't have sponsors or ad agencies or Nielsen ratings to worry about or to placate. It can present the truth unvarnished. Frequently, the lack of varnish is enforced by the absence of money to buy varnish or production and this, too, is an asset—even though it's hard to convince a producer that it is.

Every so often the bare bones of truth begin to pall on the producers and directors of educational TV. Then trouble looms. They begin to pretty up the truth with production, with music, with singing, and lighting and acting—and pretty soon it doesn't resemble truth or entertainment or anything else. The most horrible example of this I know was the Bell Telephone Hour prettying up cosmic rays with cute dialogue and cartoons and sound effects to the point where anyone seeing it could never understand cosmic rays at all.

Michigan television has not done anything that bad but now and then production does rear its head. One of the "Genius" series was on Magellan—"My Name—Magellan," cried the hero just like in "Dragnet"—which resembled an Abe Burrows parody on all documentaries.

Sometimes this ingenuity was striking. The Gandhi program opened with a shot of Gandhi's few possessions—his spectacles and sandals and books. Over his picture was a simple moving account of Gandhi's assassination. In the long run, words are educational TV's greatest assets—and they are inexpensive though precious.

While the rest of television is drowning in triviality, educational TV has another great asset which those in charge of it sometimes forget—and that is the sheer importance of its subject matter. Here they have done massive 10-part studies of Russia and China. When the viewer has finished with these, he is left with a very real sense of achievement, far more lasting and rewarding than any amount of entertainment.

There's no limit to what persevering young men can do with little but their own ingenuity. Besides television, Michigan has an educational radio station, WUOM, which is now preparing a series on journalism. Here again the power of words is striking.

I listened to one of these on foreign correspondence and heard Eric Sevareid complain: "There isn't much point in having very able men scattered all over the world if the networks only use a minute or so a day on news programs. It's not enough to get the facts; space is needed to present them on the air and now the men don't have the opportunity."

It was quite a hard-bitten honest roundup of expression from some of the most capable newsmen in the business.

A "REVOLUTION" IS ON THE WAY

(By John Crosby)

NEW YORK.—On my lecture tour I am impressed and just a little abashed to discover that the first question on everyone's lips is a sort of half-belligerent, half-prayerful: "How about educational television?" I'm tempted to reply: "Yeah, how about that"—and let it go at that. Because, I'm afraid I come from a very backward city in that regard. In some 34 cities, none of them in New York, educational television stations are now busily disgorging education on the daytime and nighttime air, hitherto considered sacred to the sale of deodorants. However, while we don't have a station, we do have the Metropolitan Educational Television Association trying to catch up, mostly with daytime programs on channel 11. The other day I had a talk with Richard Heffner, director of programing at META, on just what they're up to at META these days.

"We have quite diverse programing now. For instance we have a French course each day, a course on the Far East is given on Wednesdays by Dr. John Stoessinger of Hunter College, playwrights in the contemporary theater given by Norris Houghton, and a Russian course by Miss Katherine Alexieff of St. John's."

Not long ago META invited some of its Russian students to its headquarters at the Carnegie Endowment International Center and conducted its TV class from there. This was partly to find out how many people were taking its Russian course, partly to dramatize an appeal for funds. The results were gratifying. Students of Russian of all ages, including some Boy Scouts from New Jersey, overflowed the room, happily phrasing Miss Alexieff's sentences and answering questions in Russian on camera. Russian is not an easy language to teach but it can be taught on TV and is being taught in about 32 cities. If Russian can be taught, anything can be taught on television.

While ETV (educational television) is supposed to have a small audience, Heffner says with great earnestness that ETV alone can really reach all of the people: "Everyone wants to learn, to know, to grow—in some area or other, ETV doesn't have to capture the largest possible audience—all at the same time—as the commercial stations do. But cumulatively it can get your interest with one kind of program, mine with another. ETV can truly foster alternative programing. This makes it possible to reach all of the people—and it doesn't have to worry about getting them all at once."

The educational and cultural challenges that confront this country are manyfold and Heffner thinks the greatest weapon—and one of the most neglected—is educational TV.

A glance at channel 11 during the day will show META's strong points and weaknesses. I have watched warm, relaxed, vital teachers imparting science so skillfully that it was a pleasure to watch. I have seen math courses in singsong English by bored teachers who almost put me to sleep. We have all had teachers like that in school. There's no excuse for having them on television.

But even with its small budget and sometimes shaky foundation, META has always caused a run on course books in local stores, brought forth innumerable letters to me, and tremendous interest from all levels and all ages. Right now, it's preparing courses for distribution on languages and linguistics, astronomy, poets, and poetry. This is just the beginning of what the Rockefeller report calls "a long overdue revolution in teaching techniques."

GLOBAL TV IS COMING

(By James L. Kilgallen)

NEW YORK.—Worldwide television—how soon? Perhaps within 10 years, according to Edmond H. Leavey, president of International Telephone and Telegraph Corp., a former major general in the U.S. Army, and one of the Nation's foremost experts in communications.

"By one electronics development or another, worldwide television can be a reality within a generation—perhaps within 10 years," he told me in an interview. "The major problems have been solved, so this method of global communications could come as quickly as capital is made available and the relay stations are built."

A second question was: What will this mean to the world?

"Obviously, worldwide TV would bring a better understanding among all free nations of the world," said Leavey.

"Conceivably it could mean the development of a universal language and, eventually, it should lead to an unprecedented era of peace which I am sure all men, in their hearts, desire."

Already, the electronics industry has made international television possible, marking a big stride toward worldwide television. This was accomplished through "over-the-horizon" transmission, a technique pioneered by I.T. & T.

The first commercial television of "O/H," as it is termed, came on September 13, 1957, when a program originating in the United States was seen in Cuba for the first time through this technique.

Explaining how this technique works, Leavey said:

"Envision the world surrounded by a gaseous blanket, 5 to 10 miles above the surface of the earth. This is the troposphere. Television signals, shot from a powerful transmitter, strike the gaseous layer. Some of the signals move out into space.

"Some signals are scattered forward and drop to the earth, where they are captured by highly sensitive receivers, given new strength, and transmitted on to a television station which broadcasts the program to its viewers."

In other words, O/H signals can be bounced from one land mass to another.

With O/H transmission now working smoothly between Florida and Cuba—over a 187-mile link from Florida City, Fla., to Guanabo, Cuba, just south of Havana—its future possibilities excite the imagination. Electronics experts believe it is only a question of time when this service will be worldwide.

Every Friday night boxing matches in the United States, under the sponsorship of the National Broadcasting Co., are seen in Cuba at the same time they are viewed in the United States. Other programs have also been carried.

The 1958 World Series games were transmitted from New York and Milwaukee to Cuba by O/H. On-the-spot coverage of the recent overthrow of Batista in Cuba was fed from Havana to U.S. TV screens by this technique.

The next step in the direction of worldwide TV, according to scientists, might be the establishment of a series of transmitters and receivers which would take the shortest route across the top of the world via land masses, with O/H transmitters shooting signals from one country to another.

In Europe at present there is a TV network called Eurovision. It's a system whereby one European country transmits to another by TV—not on a regular basis but only on big events such as the coronation of the Pope.

Eventually, Eurovision could serve as a terminal for transatlantic communication from America in the establishment of worldwide television.

Now that international television is in operation between the United States and Cuba, the next step could be to set up an all-Spanish language network which would embrace Cuba, Mexico, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, and Puerto Rico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOUGLAS in the chair). The committee amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 7. No application for any grant under this Act may be accepted by the Commissioner of Education after the day which is five years after the date of enactment of this Act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I find it necessary to oppose the bill which is presently before the Senate. In a general way, it provides for a million dollars in grants to the respective States for establishing and improving educational TV.

While, of course, "improve" is a word that has a wide latitude and is subject to a great deal of interpretation, I presume improvement will go on year after year unto infinity. So, in the launching of a program of this kind, I can see it is the beginning, and certainly not the end. I presume that at some time in the future much more money will be involved in this program than is authorized by the pending bill.

Once again I find it necessary to invite attention to the fact that this bill is not consonant with the budget of the President of the United States for the fiscal year 1960. It may well be said, since we have 49 States, there will be involved only $49 million, and what is $49 million in an era and an age when we so carelessly throw billions of dollars around?

I have just finished making a TV film for the viewers and listeners back home, and also some radio tapes. I do that every week for some 50 or 60 stations in Illinois. I spent a part of the weekend developing a little information on the so-called missile program, because nothing bewilders me more than the intriguing subject of missiles. I learned that in the fiscal year 1959 we have earmarked, as I recall, some $7 billion for missiles, and in fiscal 1960 there will be an equivalent amount.

I entered Congress 25 years ago, when the whole Government was operated for about half that sum. So it is understandable when people say, "Well, it is only $50 million." But, frankly, $50 million is not hay to the taxpayers anywhere in the country.

What is the present situation with respect to channels? There are 257 television channels set aside for educational television. Of that number 50 are very high frequency channels, which are the more desirable channels. There are 171 ultra high frequency channels. Those are mainly available for educational TV purposes.

In principle, the program is good. But the question is, Is there a need for the Federal Government being requested to put up money for this program, and for its development and improvement? We ought to look at the progress of educational TV in the past 6 years. 32 States have taken action for its development. It cannot be said they have been laggard or are guilty of laches. Seven States have appropriated funds for statewide TV educational programs. 37 stations have come on the air in the past 6 years. That is a rather creditable record, I think. 12 stations are in the process of building or preparations are being made to build them. There are 41 locations in the planning stage.

Under such circumstances, with those channels available for educational purposes, it can scarcely be said progress has not been made or that the States have not been aware of or alerted to their responsibility.

In addition thereto, we are getting some closed circuit TV. It has been reported that has been increasing at a rather fast rate.

If this program were absolutely necessary, quite aside from whether it is desirable or not, surely the Secretary of the department of Government which is concerned with education and in which the Office of Education is located would be coming before the appropriate committee and making rather vigorous and robust advocacy of the program and urging Congress to adopt it. That is not the case, if I read correctly the letter addressed to the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, date February 2 of this year, a letter over the signature of Arthur S. Flemming, the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Mr. Flemming is no novice in this field or in the governmental field. He came before us once as Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. He has held other responsible positions in Government. He is Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare today. He gained distinction for himself in the educational field as president of an outstanding college in Ohio. I refer to Dr. Arthur S. Flemming.

In his letter to the committee he states, among other things:

> The Radio-Television Services Section of the Office of Education has played an active role in both the promotion and evaluation of educational television.

Further along in the letter he states:

> The National Defense Education Act of 1958, authorizes the Commissioner of Education, through grants or contracts, to conduct, assist, and foster research and experimentation in the use of television, radio, motion pictures, and related media for educational purposes.

I submit that statement only to point out that he is identified with this field; and that the Office of Education and the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare are alert to their responsibilties and to the needs in this field.

So, on the basis of that qualification, here is a recital in the Secretary's letter which I think is quite persuasive:

> We have no information indicating that a Federal program, such as this bill would provide, is necessary to assure continuing development of educational television, or that there is an inability to finance the acquisition and installation of transmitting equipment.

There is the Cabinet officer who, in the structure of Government responsible for the Nation's activities in the education field—and that includes educational television—stating very simply, in language all can understand, that the States are able to finance the program; that they are able to procure the necessary equipment, and that there is no information indicating that this proposed Federal program is necessary.

So it seems to me a statement of that kind merits the attention of the legislative branch, charged, as it is, with the responsibility for the public purse, and undertaking, if it can, to cojoin with the President in attaining a balanced budget, or a reasonably balanced budget.

The Secretary made another statement in that letter which merits attention:

> It is our view that for the present, at least, Federal assistance in the development of educational television is most effectively rendered through the assignment of transmitting channels for educational use, the general encouragement of ultrahigh frequency transmission, and study and research in the utilization for educational purposes.

Then he says, among other things, that a weakness in the bill lies in the fact that it does not "provide any guide for establishing a reasonable and equitable method for allocating the total funds available among the States."

The Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare says that the necessity has not been established, and that there are no effective guidelines for allocating this money among the States. So it occurs to me it would be unwise, notwithstanding the action taken by the Senate last year, to enact the bill into law at this time. If my understanding is correct, the House rejected the bill. The bill is before the Senate for a second time.

I wish to summarize the arguments of the chief administrative officer in Government under whose direction the bill would be administered. He says, first, there is no information that a Federal program such as this bill provides is necessary; second, there is no information that there is an inability on the part of the States to finance such a program; third, that there is no guide for allocating the funds; and, fourth, he recommends that the bill not be enacted into law.

When we talk about development and improvement and acquisition of facilities for educational TV, Mr. President, let us look down the road a little further. We will soon have to start talking about maintenance of those facilities, also. TV facilities are sensitive, and involve highly expensive appliances. States may acquire facilities under terms of this bill and then say, "We need additional money for maintenance," or, "we need expansion of these facilities." So a measure of this kind may become an entering wedge rather than the final conclusion of a venture in this field.

I submitted this matter to the Bureau of the Budget, and I learned it was not consonant with the budget estimates or the budget program of the President of the United States.

Since the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is opposed to passage of the bill, and since the Bureau of the Budget is opposed, considering the spending mood which is presently upon us I think we have a responsibility to conserve even $50 million, although in a budget of seventy thousand million dollars it seems to be only a little bit of money. So, Mr. President, recognizing, as I do, the possibilities of television as an instrumentality in the educational field, I still feel it necessary to lift my voice in opposition to the bill, because it is not necessary at this time. The States can take the load, and we should not put this burden upon the 1960 budget.

When the 1960 budget was submitted to us the figures were so closely calibrated that we could see only roughly a $70 million surplus. This bill, if passed, would almost demolish the small surplus which was contemplated by those who, in connection with the activities and the functions of Government, gave so much time and attention to assembling figures which would keep the budget in balance and generate good will and confidence on the part of the people not only at home but abroad.

I am therefore not willing to authorize the additional $50 million, because it will be too easy to say, on another occasion when a bill which is founded on desirable principles and is designed to provide a desirable function is under consideration, "It involves only $50 million." It takes only 10 bills each involving $50 million to make a half billion dollars. Pretty soon we would have a real impact upon our fiscal structure, the delicate fabric upon which this country rests.

The testimony and the letter of the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare speak for themselves. I am quite content, since the Secretary is expert in the field and is charged with the responsibility for the educational activities of the country, to stand upon his recommendation when he says that this bill should not be enacted into law.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the letter of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare; and, following that, the testimony and statement of Mr. William G. Harley, president of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters, which represents 142 colleges and universities.

There being no objection, the letter, testimony, and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
February 2, 1959.

Hon. WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This letter is in response to your request of January 12, 1959, for a report on S. 12, a bill to expedite the ultilization of television transmission facilities in our public schools and colleges, and in adult training programs.

S. 12 would authorize the appropriation of such amounts as may be necessary to assist the States and certain organizations therein to establish or improve television broadcasting for educational purposes. It would authorize the Commissioner of Education, upon the application of an eligible State agency, officer, or organization, to make a grant—such grants not to exceed an aggregate of $1 million in any State for the establishment or improvement of television broadcasting facilities to be used only for educational purposes. The "establishment or improvement of television broadcasting facilities" is defined as "the acquisition and installation of transmission apparatus necessary for television (including closed-circuit television) broadcasting." Eligible agencies would be limited to (a) the agency primarily responsible for the State supervision of public elementary and secondary schools; (b) a nonprofit foundation, corporation, or association organized primarily to engage in or encourage educational television broadcasting; (c) a duly constituted State educational television commission; and (d) a State controlled college or university. The applicant would be required to provide satisfactory assurance to the Commissioner of Education that the necessary funds to operate and maintain such facilities would be available.

In its sixth report and order, dated April 14, 1952, the Federal Communications Commission set aside 242 channels (now 257) for the exclusive use of noncommercial educational television (representing approximately 12 percent of all channels available for television use in the United States). Each State and Territory, as well as the District of Columbia, was assigned the maximum number of channels then available to provide an opportunity for a minimum service deemed necessary for the use of the noncommercial educational use of a portion of the publicly owned television channels of our country.

Under the provisions of the sixth report and order and further, under the rules for operation adopted by the Commission, 32 States have called statewide conferences, set up State advisory commissions, and otherwise have taken action toward the development of educational television on a statewide basis. One group of States, the Southern Conference of 16 States, has investigated the possibilities of an interchange of program output within their area, in order to reduce costs of operation and avoid duplication of effort in subject-matter fields of educational interest.

Seven States have appropriated funds directly to support statewide educational television operations—Alabama, Florida, Georgia, New York, North Carolina, Oklahoma, and Oregon. Many other States contribute indirectly to educational television stations and closed circuit operations through appropriations to their State universities or in partial support of individual school systems. Among such university stations are those located at Michigan State University, the University of Wisconsin, the University of Nebraska, the University of Washington, the University of Illinois, Oregon State College, and Ohio State University. The University of Minnesota, the University of Utah, the University of Georgia, and the University of Arizona are all now building or operating stations. Expenditures for educational television via closed circuit within campus are made for those programs carried on by at least 50 more institutions.

During the 6-year period of the development of educational television, 37 noncommercial educational stations have come on the air and some 12 are in process of building or preparatory to building. Another group of approximately 41 locations are in the planning stage.

Research to date indicates that television is a practical means of transmitting a wide variety of knowledge and skills and possesses the potential of serving educational needs existing both within and beyond the classroom. Educational television, however, is still largely in the state of experiment and planning, as indicated by this report.

Closed-circuit construction for educational television, from present reports, is increasing at a fast rate in all parts of the country. There is evidence of a steady growth of interest in every phase of educational television from preschool to university extension, and further evidence at hand shows that it will continue to elicit and deserve public support and approval.

The Radio-Television Services Section of the Office of Education has played an active role in both the promotion and evaluation of educational television. It will continue to be of such assistance. Title VII of Public Law 85-864, the National Defense Education Act of 1958, authorizes the Commissioner of Education, through grants or contracts, to conduct, assist, and foster research and experimentation in the use of television, radio, motion pictures, and related media for educational purposes. It also authorizes him to make studies and surveys to determine the need for increased utilization of these media by State or local educational agencies and institutions of higher learning and to make available to them the results of research in this field. The program thus authorized is being rapidly and vigorously developed by the Office of Education.

We have no information indicating that a Federal program, such as this bill would provide, is necessary to assure continuing development of educational television, or that there is an inability to finance the acquisition and installation of transmitting equipment. Some States have as yet taken no steps to initiate the necessary planning for utilizing television in their educational programs and some States have moved more slowly than others in carrying their planning to the point of actual operation of facilities. It is our view that for the present, at least, Federal assistance in the development of educational television is most effectively rendered through the assignment of transmitting channels for educational use, the general encouragement of ultrahigh frequency transmission, and study and research in the utilization for educational purposes.

Finally, it should be noted that the bill, while limiting to $1 million the amount of grants for television facilities in any one State, does not establish, or provide any guide for establishing a reasonable and equitable method for allocating the total funds available among the States.

For the reasons discussed above, and in the light of the healthy and continued growth of educational television, though the purpose of the bill is most laudable in intent, we recommend that S. 12 not be enacted.

The Bureau of the Budget advises that it perceives no objection to the submission of this report to your committee.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR S. FLEMMING,
Secretary.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM G. HARLEY, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EDUCATIONAL BROADCASTERS, MADISON, WIS.

Mr. HARLEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am William Harley. I am here on behalf of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters. This is a 34-year-old association made up of 142 universities, colleges, public schools, and nonprofit community corporations which operate or hold construction permits for 148 nonprofit educational radio and 35 nonprofit educational television stations.

The preamble to our constitution states that we associate ourselves to promote the dissemination of knowledge, education and information to the end that the educational, cultural, and technical benefits of broadcasting may be extended to all.

Our appearance here this morning is entirely consistent with that stated purpose.

Though I have a prepared statement to offer for the record, in the interest of conserving time I will confine my remarks to a summary of points relating to this central idea; namely, the need for extending the educational benefits of broadcasting to all, and the relation of this proposed legislation in helping to realize that objective.

In testimony presented yesterday and before this committee last April there has been ample documentation of the crisis in education, and convincing evidence presented as to the use of television as a tested tool for helping to meet both the qualitative as well as the quantitative problems confronting education. It has the potential for providing more information to more people in less time than any instrument yet devised.

This tool for education stands ready, awaiting the support which can project it into the full usefulness of which it is capable.

There are now 36 educational television stations in the United States. Most of these are not adequately financed; few have sufficient power or enough physical facilities. Where they do exist, their usefulness and economy are each year being demonstrated.

We believe the record of educational television's contribution to education at all of the levels is an impressing one wherever it exists, either on a broadcast or closed-circuit basis, but it exists in all too few spots to provide the national assistance our educational efforts require now.

As I stand here, two-thirds of the population of the United States has no access to educational television. All but some 20 of the great universities of the United States have no television station to help them meet their regular and adult educational responsibilities. All but some 150 of the many thousands of school systems of the Nation are probably years away from access to this electronic miracle unless Federal assistance is provided.

Unless such support is available we believe that for many years there will be some 50 to 60 television stations in the Nation, while more than 150 other frequencies allocated for education lie fallow.

With only two or three exceptions, State, regional, and national networks will remain unrealized greens unless and until Federal funds are made available to construct stations to fill in the gaps, the hundreds of miles which separate these pioneer islands of television from each other.

We regard these funds proposed in this legislation as pump-priming funds, and, to mix a metaphor, are a tremendous shot in the arm for television, and a one shot in the arm. There should be no need to come back for a booster. With the added impetus and encouragement these Federal funds could provide we believe the States and individual communities can then push forward with the job to its fulfillment.

There is a need for this pump priming. It is absolutely essential that very few of the present 36 stations would now be on the air or at least as far along in their development if it were not for the pump priming provided for the first 20 or 21 stations by the fund for adult education.

The $100,000 to $150,000 made available for these emerging stations made all the difference between whether these stations just incubated or finally hatched.

Last year, in testimony before this committee, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare indicated that they had no evidence to indicate a need for Federal assistance to educational television in this country. I certainly trust that in the nearly a year which has elapsed since that time, the Department has taken the trouble to find out the facts about this situation, because there are plenty of situations in this country to provide ample evidence that State and local agencies are not in a position to get an educational television station established.

So, gentlemen, there is a need, and whether or not such aid is forthcoming can mean the difference between leadership for the United States and second-rate status for our Nation in education. Absence of such help can mean delay of a generation, and that may be too long.

Therefore, on the basis of solid evidence presented in testimony before this committee on April 24 and 25 of 1958 and January 27, 1959, regarding both the educational needs of our Nation and of the needs of our educational system for more modern instruments of instruction, and of the potential of television as an instrument available to help solve our national educational needs now, I would most earnestly urge passage of this legislation.

Thank you.

Senator MONRONEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Harley.

Would you say that the distribution of the funds provided in this bill, $1 million per State, is an equitable distribution, from your standpoint?

Mr. HARLEY. I think it is a very practical and reasonable approach to the situation. I think that other solutions might be provided but I think that this is the most workable one.

Some stations have different population densities, but in other cases the places, where there are not as many people and in other places there is more need.

Senator MONRONEY. The more populous States have a greater audience so they get a major benefit out of it even though the expenditure might be the same.

It is not like so many classrooms that are necessary to house students. This does reach out into the other areas.

Mr. HARLEY. That is correct.

Senator MONRONEY. Would you say also that while it will act as the seedcorn in some States that do not now have any educational television, it will also be a very great shot in the arm to those who desire to further expand the service area of their programs that are now local in character by establishing statewide networks?

Mr. HARLEY. I agree absolutely. Not only do we need to expand existing facilities, but it is absolutely true that this might provide the impetus for establishing stations where none now exist.

It is frequently the case that in a State where tax funds would be made available to support educational television, the feeling is that unless the service can be provided for every citizen of the State, these funds should not be provided to establish service to a local area. And they don't have funds for a whole television network in the State immediately available, so nothing is done at all.

I think that funds of this order, if made available, might trigger the establishment of State networks in many areas.

Senator MONRONEY. Do you also think that in this program that the Federal Communications Commission owes a duty, since many areas of the United States such as New York, New Jersey, Virginia, District of Columbia, and many others I could mention, where you have large blocks of population and an extremely high adult population, that would like to receive nonclassroom educational television, that the FCC owes a duty to this vast group of people to try, through whatever engineering facilities they might require, to see if additional V stations could be squeezed into some of these areas?

Mr. HARLEY. I certainly hope and feel that it is an obligation of the FCC to do something about making benefits of television more generally available to every citizen of the country.

This is the greatest opportunity this Nation has ever had to make equality of educational opportunity available to everyone. It would be a crying shame if we didn't take advantage of this opportunity to realize this objective.

Senator MONRONEY. In other words, the equipment for a V or U station is almost the same, isn't it? I mean, as to cost. You don't pay a great deal more for the machinery to broadcast over a U than you do over a V?

Mr. HARLEY. The equipment is substantially the same. From the standpoint of the number of individuals reached by VHF compared to UHF, VHF is much more satisfactory.

Senator MONRONEY. You would have a hundred times greater yield on the same investment?

Mr. HARLEY. Absolutely.

Senator MONRONEY. So if as a part of this move we could move the Federal Communications Commission to resurvey areas which now do not have V channels for V dropins, we could reach millions where only thousands are reached by putting in U stations.

Mr. HARLEY. We would certainly be pleased with such an outcome.

Senator MONRONEY. Are the U transmitters easily and cheaply convertible to V if the channel is maintained?

Mr. HARLEY. I don't have the technical knowledge to answer that.

Senator MONRONEY. The cost of converting from U to V transmission should be studied. So while they are studying for the V locations in the areas which do not have educational V's today, specifically the Middle Atlantic States, including New York and New England, it may be possible to go on the air, perhaps with a U and if conversion is found to be inexpensive, the U transmitter can be converted to V as soon as one is available. Thus the public will have the advantage of having available an educational channel.

Mr. HARLEY. I think so.

Senator MONRONEY. Senator CASE?

Senator CASE. I have no questions at this time.

Senator MONRONEY. We appreciate very much your help and information given this committee, Mr. Harley, and wish you Godspeed in the work you are doing for educational broadcasting.

Mr. HARLEY. Thank you, sir. It has been a great privilege.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM G. HARLEY ON S. 12

I am William G. Harley. I speak on behalf of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters, of which I am president. This is the 34-year-old association which is made up of the 142 universities, colleges, public schools, and nonprofit community corporations which operate or hold construction permits for 148 nonprofit educational radio and 35 nonprofit educational television stations. These stations are operated in the direct service of American education, as their primary function. In that respect I speak on behalf of American education rather than on behalf of broadcasting as such.

The NAEB, as I shall hereafter refer to our association, is the senior organization in the field of educational television and radio. In this capacity we have at various times in our history also seen specialized needs that we could not ourselves meet. NAEB leadership was instrumental in the creation of the Joint Council on Educational Television, which was set up to help safeguard the frequencies allocated to educational television and to expedite, as much as possible, their activation. The NAEB also recommended the creation of the Educational Television and Radio Center, which is the network for educational television. We are represented on the boards of the joint council and the center, and work closely and cooperatively with both. We have also had the privilege of being represented in testimony before other congressional committees in the past.

I would like, first of all, to thank the committee for the opportunity to appear here today on behalf of a service on the full development of which American education counts heavily to meet many of the needs and challenges of the years immediately ahead.

I would also like to thank you for the understanding and sympathy which our representatives were accorded, some 9 months ago, in appearances before this same committee.

At that time Mr. Richard B. Hull presented in some detail the history of educational broadcasting in the United States, and of the NAEB. We believe this is an honorable story of dedicated educators who all along have seen the possibilities of the electronic broadcast mediums as tools of education, and have sought to secure their benefits for American education. It is also a story of impoverishment amidst plenty, of the decimation of educational radio stations in the 1920's and 1930's because of the lack of funds, and the lack of other kinds of understanding and support of the sort which this bill, if approved, could begin to develop for television.

I should like to say a few words on behalf of educational radio, before I proceed to the principal portion of my statement. For we of the NAEB see television and radio both as educational resources, and much of what I shall say about television could also be said of educational radio. Moreover, school broadcasting by radio gives us some understanding and perspectives on what to expect from television, when it is adequately established.

Back in Wisconsin, which is my home State, we have pioneered in the use of radio to supplement instruction. We operate the only State radio network in the Nation; 10 transmitters programed from studios on the university campus.

For 28 years the Wisconsin Radio School of the Air has enriched classroom instruction in grade schools of the State. Approximately 284,000 individual Wisconsin children listen to these programs, with total enrollments in the various courses, on the basis of 2½ programs per child each week, of 710,000. In many counties 100 percent of the schools are now equipped with receivers, as a tribute to the usefulness of this broadcast service. This may give you some indication of what can be expected of educational television, which by adding the visual dimension, brings even more meaningful concepts into the experience of students and adults alike.

Our Nation was rudely awakened a little over a year ago by a flying object which Russia called a sputnik but which, so far as implications for America were concerned, was a flying alarm clock. Let us hope that Russia does not have to launch the equivalent of a sputnik in the use of television for educational purposes in order to bring the breakthrough which American education so desperately needs if it is again to seize a position of world leadership in education not only in science, mathematics, and the modern foreign languages but also in those humanities, social sciences, and cultural areas for which the world and especially the underdeveloped nations look to us for leadership. The testimony presented before this committee last April 24 and 25 made one fact clear: That television, with its potential capacity to impart more information to more people in less time than any medium yet devised, is an effective means of realizing the dream of our Founding Fathers for universal education. And this effectiveness has been demonstrated at all levels of education, from the primary grades through adult education, and in virtually all subjects in which it has been responsibly tried.

As a nation, we are committed to equal educational opportunity for all. Yet today in hundreds of rural areas there are no teachers qualified to teach physics, modern languages, art, music, and many other urgently needed disciplines. Many paraplegics and many who are aged or infirm, or even simply ashamed to go back to school, perhaps with their children or grandchildren, are left unserved. The millions of illiterates we have, and refugees who need to learn our language and our traditions, are unrealized resources of our Nation. The need is here. A tool is here, a powerful tool, to help solve these problems.

The crisis confronting education in this country regarding the appalling lack of facilities and teachers to cope with ever-mounting enrollments has been too well documented to need repeating here. Let me cite but one such statistic: At the present rate of training teachers it appears that there will be a shortage, at least of well-trained teachers, of some quarter of a million by 1965. By increasing the productivity of good teachers, and making adjustments possible in teacher loads and functions, educational television can greatly assist with this problem as well.

However, I would like to make clear that the NAEB does not promote television or radio, which we also deem important in education, as a replacement for teachers or for space or other facilities. We need better education—not cheaper education. We don't offer television merely as a temporary expedient regardless of how useful and efficient it is, for helping to solve the logistics problems of too many students, too little space, or too few teachers. We offer television principally to improve the quality and amount of good instruction which our Nation needs in so many subject areas.

Television can extend the influence of good teachers. But more importantly it can contribute to the effectiveness of the teaching of all teachers and the learning of all students. As a teacher training instrument as well as for informing the citizens of America of what their schools are doing, by opening a window on the classroom through which all who will can see, television offers an additional and promising new dimension for education.

Educational television also stands for a type of general public service which commercial television so far has not been able to offer in anything like adequate quantity or quality. Educational television makes the best minds of America's great educational institutions available to the whole community. It expands the public service potential of State and Federal agencies, helping to bring the Government and its elected officials closer to the people, and the people closer to their Government. We believe the hundreds of hours of this sort of programing on the educational stations of the Nation in this regard, as reported on in the hearings last April, are eloquent testimony to the social, educational, and general public service responsibility of educational television as it is emerging in these United States. It is attracting to positions of management some of the finest educators and community leaders and adult educators of our Nation—men who see here a facility with great promise for arousing our people to intellectual and community activity—arousing the honest curiosity and eagerness to learn which has too often been forgotten in recent years, in our belief that people want only whipped cream and meringue. We find that people, common everyday people, hungry for solid "nutritional" fare of an intellectual nature, respond and are grateful, and tell their friends about this new kind of television. Thus, the value systems implicit in commercial television in the United States find a counterbalance in the thoughtful and thought-provoking programing which characterize educational television's growing adult services.

The effectiveness of television as an instrument of education has been proved over and over again. Its economy, in comparison with outdated approaches, is increasingly recognized. It stands ready as a tool, or genii, awaiting the support which can project it into the full usefulness of which it is capable.

There are now 36 educational television stations in the United States. Most of these are not adequately financed. But where they exist, their usefulness and economy and courage are each year building more stable support for them.

We believe then that the record of educational television's contributions to education at all levels is an impressive one wherever it exists, either on a broadcast or closed circuit basis. But it exists in all too few spots to provide the national assistance our educational effort requires now.

As I stand here, two-thirds of the population of the United States has no access to educational television. All but some 20 of the great universities of the United States have no television station to help them meet their regular and adult education responsibilities. All but some 150 out of the many thousands of school systems of the Nation are years away from access to this electronic miracle unless Federal assistance is provided. Unless Federal support is provided, we believe that, for many years, there will be no more than some 40 to 50 educational television stations in the Nation, while over 200 other frequencies, allocated for education, lie fallow. With three or four exceptions, potential State, regional, and national networks will only remain unrealized dreams unless and until Federal funds are made available to construct stations to fill the gaps—the hundreds of miles which separate these pioneer islands of educational television—these lighthouse stations—from each other. Whether or not such aid is forthcoming can mean the difference between leadership for the United States and second rate status for our Nation in education. Absence of such help can mean delay of a generation; and that may be too long. I need not remind you, gentlemen, I know, how precarious is the position of the channels allocated for educational television. Commercial broadcasters, various industries, the armed services, and a multitude of other perfectly deserving organizations remind the Federal Communications Commission periodically of the unused resource contained in these channels for which funds have not been available to erect stations. They are under pressure. This pressure is daily increasing as the competition for more room in the spectrum intensifies.

We believe this bill, if approved, would give great impetus to station activation, and virtually at once, would announce this Nation's resolve not only to preserve but to use them for America's most critical need—for education. In many States, the use of State or public funds to develop educational television stations has been delayed or prevented, by the belief that, if State funds are to be used to support educational television, the service must be available to the entire State—not merely to those fortunate few who are within the service area of the university, or school system, or proposed organization seeking to launch it. Funds of the order proposed by this bill, though not sufficient to solve this problem fully, would break this deadlock, by making State systems, capable of serving, in most cases, the majority of the population and the schools of the State, a more realizable objective.

Once such vistas are opened, with pump-priming funds made available to make a start possible, we believe that live regional networks will not be long in forming—and a live national educational network can begin to be developed. Then, at last, this Nation will have a real alternative service to the entertainment-centered and commercial-based services which are the only ones we now have in most of the country. To summarize: Events of the first half of the 20th century, marked by two world wars, discovery of "the bomb," and culminating in space conquest, have shocked traditional education into an awareness that its problems do not and cannot end with halls of ivy and yesterday's print-based curriculums. The classroom has become the community, the Nation, the world. Schools, colleges, and universities, in an effort to preserve tomorrow's world, and make it better for our children, are trying to use every facility available to extend their area of service and their potential for usefulness.

The little band of individuals in my association who, years ago, had dreams about the great usefulness of these electronic instruments of education, and fought for frequencies for education first in standard AM radio (unsuccessfully), and later in FM radio and television (the latter two successfully) offer you this tool. Not as a replacement of teachers—or of space—or of higher salaries for teachers—but in support of, and as assistance to, all the other tools and resources we can muster. And with it we offer a growing body of dedicated members of our association also, who have learned and are daily learning to use this tool in new ways—for the good of American education.

If I may quote Dean Gordon Sabine, of Michigan State University: "The educational needs of the United States have so far outstripped the educational capabilities of the Nation that we must have educational television to help us win the fight to educate a whole people. Without it, we surely are defeated."

We of the NAEB feel that approval of the bill will also be a step toward something which for many years has been close to our hearts: The development of a sound national communications policy to the end that all the broadcast media, no matter in whose hands they rest, are employed for the greatest good of the Nation and the world.

Therefore, on the basis of the solid evidence presented in testimony before this committee on April 24 and 25 of 1958, regarding both the educational needs of our Nation and of our educational system for more modern instruments of instruction; and of the potential of television as an instrument available to help solve our national educational needs now, I would most earnestly urge passage of this legislation.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the part of the report containing the allocations now made to each State in the Union, appendix III, beginning on page 63 of the report.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Educational stations on the air.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, not only as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which reported this bill favorably, but also as a member of the Education Subcommittee and as chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee, I have had an opportunity this year, serving on those three committees and subcommittees, to hear a great deal of testimony about our increasing educational needs and the growing educational lag because of the rapidly increasing number of scholastics, with our expanding population, and the inability to obtain qualified teachers in sufficient number to keep up with the demand. I understand there is at this time a shortage of about 140,000 classrooms in the schools of the United States and a shortage of from 135,000 to 140,000 qualified teachers. In fact, in many States, as was testified before the Education Subcommittee this morning, we are having difficulty obtaining qualified teachers. It is necessary to search for a long time to find teachers to fill vacancies.

Judging from the testimony we heard, I believe that this new medium of instruction, television, will do for education about what the automobile has done for transportation. The automobile has speeded transportation and brought it within reach of all the people. Some initial experiments have shown that may be true with regard to television.

I think the testimony last year and this year showed that Ohio and Alabama have made greater progress than any other States of the Union in the statewide educational television programs. I think that is the reason why former Senator Bricker, who was a Member of the Senate last year and a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, was so active and so interested in working on behalf of the educational television bill last year.

The bill provides a modest amount. As has been pointed out, the money would be used only for the acquisition of land and the installation of facilities. There is nothing to be provided for operations, as has been pointed out by the distinguished minority leader.

It is expensive to operate these TV stations, but once people have an opportunity to see them in operation, I believe they will be willing to meet the cost of operation and that there will be no difficulty on that score.

In my State we have had a great deal of difficulty in getting a good program under way. The Federal Communications Commission reserved 18 channels for use in my State, but unfortunately 12 of them were the ultrahigh frequency channels, and only 6 were the VHF stations. We did get into operation in our State the first noncommercial educational TV station in the country, at the University of Houston, which was opened in 1953 and is still in use.

Mr. President, private industry wants these channels. The legislatures of some of the States have fought the actual operation of the channels. There has been some success in my State in inserting in our appropriation laws, hamstringing restrictions, to prevent the State colleges from building stations under the allocations made by the Federal Communications Commission.

However, once the stations are built and are in operation and the people have an opportunity to see the beneficial results, once the stations have demonstrated their use for educational purpose, considering the growing cost of education and the efficiency of educational TV, I think the program will grow like a snowball, and the Federal Government will then have exercised in educational matters a function which it has exercised so many times in the Nation's history, namely that of furnishing the first stimulus.

I have not had an opportunity to read all the arguments surrounding the passage of the Morrill Land Grant College Act in 1862. That was the first great national education act. I rather suspect that many of the arguments used at that time would reveal that it was urged that the cost of operating the Land Grant College Act would bankrupt the Federal Government. But the act has operated successsfully, and the States bear the cost of maintaining those institutions. More than 90 great institutions of higher learning were founded under the impetus of that act. The States took them over and operated them at their own expense. That has happened in the case of many other programs.

This bill is not designed to put the Federal Government into the business of operating educational television stations. It represents the initial stimulus or impetus, to give the States and local subdivisions an opportunity to obtain the equipment to establish their stations. They will operate them at their own cost.

The amount of money we are spending on education is about 4 percent of our gross national product. We spend more on alcohol, tobacco, and cosmetics than we spend on education of all kinds. Education in this country is lagging because of that fact.

This proposal represents one way to stimulate teacher aid and training aid in connection with one facet of our overall educational program.

The need for educational improvement is so great that I do not believe we, as a body, can afford further to delay in helping our educational institutions to gain this additional training aid, and put into operation in the many States which now have no educational television of any kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I should like to direct a few questions to the chairman of the committee.

Referring to page 34 of the committee report, it is stated, in connection with my own State:

> On September 12, 1958, the Joint Council on Educational Television in Washington, D.C., representing 10 national educational organizations, petitioned the FCC to reserve VHF channel 12 in Wilmington for educational use, inasmuch as it appeared that the authorization for commercial station WVUE would be (and subsequently has been) surrendered.

My question is this: Under the rules, just what has the Joint Council on Educational Television in Washington, D.C., to do with telling the Federal Communications Commission whether or not the only channel in the State of Delaware should be an educational facility, or whether it should or not?

I understand that the bill is being presented on the basis that no Federal control is involved. If no Federal control is involved, does the recommendation of this organization or any other out-of-State organization have any weight?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Let me say to the Senator from Delaware that surely the people of Delaware have a right to insist on keeping channel 12 in Wilmington. Whether they use it for educational television or whether some commercial group wishes to take it over, is a matter for the Federal Communications Commission to decide.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Let me finish.

The Joint Council on Educational Television has the right, along with anyone else, to petition the Federal Communications Commission. But what weight the Federal Communications Commission will give to its petition I do not know. But surely the people of Delaware themselves have the right to make the decision, and to petition the Federal Communications Commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That was the point I wished clearly to establish. I talked with the chairman of the committee previously, and I think we understand each other; but I wish to make the record clear. I do not think that this is a decision to be made by the FCC but rather a decision to be made based upon applications from Delaware.

There are those in our State who earnestly believe that this channel should be reserved for educational facilities. They have a right to that belief and to petition accordingly. Many other interests feel that it should be reserved for commercial television. They, too, have a right.

The position I have taken in connection with educational television, supported by my colleague, the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], has been that this is a decision which should be made solely by the people of the State of Delaware inasmuch as this is the only channel in the State. It is our position that recommendations from interests outside the State of Delaware should not be taken into consideration.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I cannot speak for the Federal Communications Commission, but if I were a member of it, I would give more weight to the views of the people of Delaware than to the views of outsiders. I understand that there has been some suggestion that this channel be moved to a location farther north. If I lived in Delaware I would protest such a suggestion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. It has been protested.

I merely wished to make sure that those advocating the allocation of the channel for educational television could not come back to this report later and use it as a background in support of their position.

Reading further from the report of the committee:

Since that time, nearly 200 organizations—public schools, colleges, PTA's, private schools, professional societies, health and youth associations, and others in the area which could be served by channel 12—have officially supported the JCET petition.

The report does not indicate that there is any opposition whatever. That is not the situation. I think the RECORD should show that the Governor of the State of Delaware, in a letter addressed to the Governor of Pennsylvania and also in a report which has been submitted to the Department downtown, has taken the position that this channel should not be allocated for use as an educational facility.

I notice from the report that among other agencies cited as being in favor of the pending proposal is the Wilmington Board of Public Education.

I ask unanimous consent to have included at this point in the RECORD an article which appeared in the Wilmington Journal-Every Evening of February 18, 1959, incorporating a statement by Dr. Ward I. Miller, Superintendent of Wilmington Public Schools, in which he states that it would be unwise to make this allocation strictly on an educational basis, which shows that the report is definitely in error when it lists that agency as being in support of the proposal.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRI-STATE TV PACT RAPPED AS UNWISE—SUPERINTENDENT OF CITY SCHOOLS WANTS CHANNEL 12 KEPT IN DELAWARE, COMMERCIAL OPERATION

Dr. Ward I. Miller, superintendent of Wilmington public schools, said today he felt it is unwise at the present time to enter into any educational television agreement with Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

It was the first time any educator has voiced opposition to a proposal of the Delaware Educational Television Association to have Delaware's channel 12 assigned as an educational channel and turned over to a tri-State group of educators.

The group has petitioned the Federal Communications Commission to designate the channel for education, but has come up with no plan for operation or financing.

Meanwhile, two applications for licenses to operate the channel commercially are before the FCC, one from Rollins Broadcasting Co., the other from an out-of-State combine.

Dr. Miller, in a letter to Senator J. ALLEN FREAR, Jr., (Democrat, of Delaware) made public today, expressed the opinion that retention of channel 12 for Delaware is of extreme importance.

In his letter, copies of which were also sent to Gerrish Gassaway, executive vice president of the Delaware State Chamber of Commerce, and Gail C. Belden, city board of education president, Dr. Miller declared that until there is more information on the use of television for instructional purposes and until money for the purpose is available it is better for educational authorities to work cooperatively with a commercial operator in the use of TV.

"Television is still in its infancy," Dr. Miller wrote. "While much has been done to improve the quality of programs and the technical aspects of telecasting, it is my conviction that the future will see major improvements along many lines.

"Particularly in the adaptation of television to educational purposes the experimentation to date suggests great potential," Dr. Miller continued. "Nevertheless, much must be learned both by the schools and by the stations before television can be utilized as an effective supplement to classroom teaching.

"In no sense can it replace the teacher," Dr. Miller continued. "I believe that the experimentation should continue so that there may be developed the best ways to use this marvelous medium of communication.

"In my judgment, it is unwise at this time to enter into any arrangements with the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey in the establishment of a tri-State authority to take over channel 12 for educational programs," the superintendent declared. "I feel that we are not ready to embark upon a project of such magnitude, first, for the reasons given above and second, because of the financial implications of such a proposal.

"The fiscal condition of the State of Delaware is such that no funds should be utilized for the purchase of the station nor for the annual cost of operation. We should hold fast to the educational gains that have been made up to this point and not sacrifice any of them for a project which is certain to require considerable additional money."

WOULD LOSE CONFLICTS

"It is extremely doubtful," Dr. Miller said, "that it is in the best interests of Delaware to become part of a tri-State authority. Conflicts of interest will occur from time to time. These can hardly be resolved in favor of Delaware unless we are ready at the particular time to participate in the actual purchase. This, I feel, we shall not be ready to do for some time.

"It is of extreme importance that channel 12 be reserved for Delaware," Dr. Miller emphasized. "I believe that both the educational and commercial interests of our people can be served if this is done. Every step should be taken to avoid losing the channel to outside interests."

Dr. Miller concluded by stating, "Until we are better informed concerning the use of television in instructional procedure and until money is available that can properly be used to support the cost of its operation, in my judgment it is better to work cooperatively with a commercial operator. If it should happen later on that a different situation exists, it will be possible to reconsider the matter and develop a program which will further enrich and supplement the instruction which our students are now receiving."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The report also lists the University of Delaware as being in favor of the pending proposal. I venture to say that at no point can it be shown that the University of Delaware has gone on record as indicating that the channel should be allocated to educational facilities. On the contrary, I have been advised of the opposite. I wonder if the chairman of the committee has any further information in that connection.

Mr. MAGNUSON. If the Senator from Delaware will read the entire section of the report, it may throw some light on the question. I agree with the Senator from Delaware that there should not be any such implication as that to which he refers. The report indicates that for several years the Delaware Educational Television Association has planned and produced educational programs, and has made the plans for the activation of an educational television station. The report merely says:

The membership of this organization includes the State Department of Public Instruction, the University of Delaware, the Wilmington Board of Public Education, the Delaware State Educational Association, and the Delaware Congress of Parents and Teachers—plus 17 participating organizations and an advisory council of representatives of business and industry.

We do not say that they approve of the allocation of this channel for educational television. We merely point out that there has been activity in Delaware by this association looking to the planning of educational programs, and that its membership includes certain organizations and agencies.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I understand what the committee is trying to do, but I wish to make the record clear.

Mr. MAGNUSON. If the implication to which the Senator refers is present, the Senator does well to correct it. We were merely pointing out the wide interest of the membership of the association, which had planned some of the educational programs; but there was no reference to channel 12.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The point I wish to make clear in the RECORD is that whether responsible State authorities in Delaware petition to have this channel allocated for educational facilities or whether the people of the State of Delaware decide that they want it for commercial purposes, theirs is the decision, no outside recommendation should be considered. That is a question which we should decide in our own State without any outside interference.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The Federal Communications Commission would certainly give the greatest weight to the desire of the people of Delaware in this connection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I appreciate that.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Let me say to the Senator from Delaware that I am aware of the so-called discussion or controversy in Delaware. Beginning on page 110 of the printed hearings, we have printed in full a long letter addressed to the editor of the Journal-Every Evening, of Wilmington, Del., by Richard M. Saul, executive director of the educational group, which I think makes the situation pretty clear.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I have not seen that letter. On what page is it?

Mr. MAGNUSON. It begins on page 111 of the hearings.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. All I wished to make clear was that the RECORD should show that it is our understanding that in making these allocations and in deciding how this channel should be awarded the Federal Communications Commission should take primarily into consideration the wishes of the people of the State of Delaware.

If there are pending before the Commission petitions from interests in the State that it be allocated for use as educational facilities, such petitions should be considered, along with any others which may be pending urging that the channel be used for commercial purposes. I respect the right of the Commission to consider all such petitions; however, I believe that petitions urging the use of the channel for certain purposes should originate in the State of Delaware, and not somewhere else.

Since there is only one channel assigned to the State of Delaware, I wish it to be clearly understood that we should not be told what we must do with it.

As I said before, the Governor of the State is opposed to this proposal, and many of our State educational associations are opposed to it. I have a letter from the Delaware Chamber of Commerce opposing its allocation for educational purposes. I shall not labor the point further in the Senate, but I wish it to be clear in the RECORD that we have received many petitions from people throughout the State of Delaware stating that the channel should be kept for commercial use and there are some who support the educational allocation, all of these petitions coming from the State should be considered by the Federal Communications Commission, but we do not want any outside interests interfering. We do not want anyone coming into our State and telling us what we should or should not do with the one channel we have. I wish it clearly understood that it is not a function of the Federal Communications Commission to go into a State and tell it what it is to do with its one allocated channel.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I agree entirely with what the Senator from Delaware has said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I appreciate the cooperation of the chairman of the committee in clearing up the point. I join the Senator from Illinois in opposing the passage of the bill. This was not included in the budgetary estimates. This may well prove to be the first wedge in a much more extensive program and one in which there may be greater Federal control than is visualized. I agree that the Senator from Washington has tried—and I know he is sincere in his intention—to keep it strictly outside Federal control, but I doubt if it can be done if we once launch the program. I shall therefore vote against the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 12) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The motion to table was agreed to.

CONSTRUCTION OF MODERN NAVAL VESSELS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 145, H.R. 3293.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 3293) to authorize the construction of modern naval vessels.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

AUTHORIZATION FOR THE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE TO REPORT LABOR BILL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be permitted to file its report on S. 1555, to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes, during the adjournment of the Senate, together with minority and supplemental views.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT TO WEDNESDAY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in accordance with the order previously entered, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment until 12 o'clock noon on Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3:45 o'clock p.m.), in accordance with the previous order, the Senate adjourned until Wednesday, April 15, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Charles W. Holland, Jr., pastor, Fountain Memorial Baptist Church, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

In I Timothy 3: 2 and 6, the writer says: *A bishop then must be blameless * * . Not a novice, lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the Devil.

Omniscient and eternally righteous God, when we stop to realize that one of the besetting sins of Satan was pride, as we meditate about the fact that as pride enters our heart wisdom is depleted; we entreat Thee to help us to overcome the temptation to be proud.

Dear God, we know that humility is the foe of pride; therefore help us to be cognizant continually of the need of humility. Help us that we will not be led into a false humility through trickery; but give us a humility that is genuine.

Father, help us to be humble, even as we make this petition in Thy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, April 10, 1959, was read and approved.

DEDICATION CEREMONY, TAFT MEMORIAL TOWER

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have requested this time to announce that tomorrow morning the dedicatory exercises for the Taft Memorial Bell Tower on the Capitol Grounds, just across Constitution Avenue, will begin at 10 o'clock. All Members of Congress, of course, are invited, along with their wives. Tickets have been sent to each Member of the House and each Member of the Senate, two tickets to each. Special reserved seats have been arranged and are being held for the use of Members of Congress.

If I may take just a second or two, I should like to tell you something of the program:

The Indian Hill High School Band, which comes from the little community where Senator Taft lived, will give a part of the musical program, which will start about 10 minutes of 10. Then the U.S. Marine Band will follow.

The presiding officer to open the meeting will be Representative B. CARROLL REECE of Tennessee, who is the president of the Robert A. Taft Memorial Foundation, Inc.

The invocation will be given by Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, Chaplain of the Senate.

The meaning of the tower will be explained in a short address by Representative REECE, who will present, in a body, the 100 trustees of the memorial foundation.

The meeting will then be turned over to me as the chairman of the Physical Memorial Subcommittee, and I in turn will introduce, first, Senator STYLES BRIDGES, who will speak for 4 or 5 minutes for the Senate, then Senator HARRY FLOOD BYRD, who will speak also for the Senate for about the same length of time, to be followed by William Howard Taft III, the eldest son of Senator Taft, former Ambassador to Ireland, as you recall. He will respond for a minute or so in behalf of the family.

Following I will present the former President of the United States, the chairman of the board of trustees of the foundation, the Honorable Herbert Hoover, who will deliver a eulogy on Senator Taft.

Next, the President of the United States, Dwight D. Eisenhower, honorary chairman of the foundation, will be presented, and in turn he will dedicate the memorial by turning over symbolic keys to the Vice President of the United States and to Speaker RAYBURN, of the House, both of whom will respond in behalf of the Congress.

Following the address of Mr. Speaker RAYBURN, the benediction will be given by the Acting Chaplain of the House.

This memorial, as you know, which cost approximately $1 million, is being presented to the Congress of the United States by the Taft Memorial Foundation, and the Congress will serve as its custodian for the benefit of the American people.

Following the speaking program, there will be a 20-minute carillon concert so that those assembled may have the opportunity to hear these famous bells for the first time.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file certain privileged resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may sit during general debate today and for the balance of the week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

HON. MRS. CECIL HARDEN

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, last Friday afternoon, April 10, 1959, I had the great pleasure of attending a ceremony at which our former colleague from the Sixth District of Indiana, Mrs. Cecil Harden, was sworn in by the Postmaster General as his special assistant.

In his remarks, Mr. Summerfield paid tribute to Mrs. Harden and spoke of the responsibilities she has already assumed as his principal adviser with regard to women employees in the postal service.

We who knew her so well since she first came to the Congress in 1948, know that her long experience and dedicated work as a member of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee will be of inestimable service to Mrs. Harden in carrying out her important postal responsibilities.

In her new assignment, Mrs. Harden will work closely with the Postmaster General and with Assistant Postmaster General Eugene J. Lyons, head of the Bureau of Personnel, on matters dealing with more than 55,000 women currently employed by the Post Office Department.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that every Member of the House of Representatives joins me in wishing Cecil Harden the greatest possible success as she continues her work in the service of her Government.

A SPECIAL STAMP FOR "DIXIE" AND "UNCLE DAN" EMMETT

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill authorizing and directing the Postmaster General of the United States to issue a special postage stamp of such denomination and design as he may determine to honor Daniel Decatur Emmett, who composed the song "Dixie," just 100 years ago this spring.

The stamp, if issued, would honor both the song, which is known wherever freemen live and sing, and its composer, Daniel Decatur Emmett, who was born and died near Mount Vernon, Ohio, in my 17th Congressional District. He was known as "Uncle Dan" to his many thousands of friends and devotees while he was alive, and he still is known affectionately as "Uncle Dan" among the people whose fathers and grandfathers knew him personally in the area around Mount Vernon.

As my colleagues will recall, I spoke on Daniel Decatur Emmett, and his most noted song, "Dixie," in the early part of February, in the House of Representatives in connection with the Lincoln sesquicentennial ceremonies. Since then, I have had letters from every section of the Nation from people who agree with me that his memory, and his song, are worth commemorating. It will be remembered "Dixie" and other compositions, such as "The Blue Tail Fly," were favorites of President Lincoln.

The bureaucracy at the U.S. Post Office Department does not seem to agree with me that a stamp should be issued to commemorate the 100th anniversary of this great song, and to honor this composer. I nevertheless am asking my colleagues on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service to cut through the bureaucratic redtape and to approve this legislation, notwithstanding the fact that a board, or a group, in the Post Office Department shows little interest in the idea. I think that there is so much bureaucracy connected with every little action a Congressman has to take in Washington that it is high time we in Congress reassert our prerogative to get things done, in spite of the opposition of this or that bureaucrat who may be appointed to his job for varying periods.

Despite the views of the principal bureaucrats charged with approving stamps, and stamp designs, in the U.S. Post Office Department, I, and hundreds of my constituents in Ohio, can see no valid reason at all why a stamp cannot be issued this year to commemorate the 100th anniversary of this beautiful song, and, of course, its composer, whose gentility and kindness and genius was recognized in his own day, and might well be remembered in this day and age.

It would be a shame, in my humble opinion, to let this year go by without commemorating Daniel Decatur Emmett, and "Dixie," on a national basis.

I am happy that the Kiwanis Club at Mount Vernon, Ohio, of which I am a proud member, is planning a 2-day celebration on June 26 and 27 this year to commemorate the composition of "Dixie" on a cold, wet Sunday by Uncle Dan Emmett 100 years ago. I would be most happy, Mr. Speaker, if between now and then we could report out this new bill to cause a stamp to be printed in his honor so that I might report it to my people. This is a little thing in a certain sense and yet, in another sense, it is a big thing. In any case, I think it is the right thing to do and I urge my colleagues to support my resolution.

LIBERALIZING PROVISIONS OF TARIFF ACT OF 1930

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to liberalize various provisions of the Tariff Act of 1930 respecting the importation of works of art. The bill is identical to one introduced in the other body by Senator JACOB K. JAVITS, S. 948, and in this body by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. THOMPSON]. It stands high in the interest of many of my constituents, including New York City's most magnificent art museums.

The bill would amend various paragraphs in the Tariff Act to include on the duty-free list modern-art forms presently of questionable status under the act, or which have actually been determined to be presently dutiable. The bill would also provide for duty-free entry of primitive and aboriginal art and scaled reproductions of original works, and would facilitate the entry of art for use in exhibitions on a duty-free basis.

The bill was prepared in close conjunction with, and with the full cooperation of, the American Association of Museums' committee on customs, and after consultation with a great many authorities in both the fields of art and of customs. Its effect on the revenues received from customs would be negligible. Some experts have estimated the loss of revenue at not more than $10,000 a year. Whatever the exact figure, surely it would be outweighed by the value—not monetary, but esthetic—of such a desirable stimulus to the growth of American culture.

Mr. Speaker, this is legislation which certainly ought to be given high priority. Not only would its passage greatly aid the progress of many of our great museums and educational institutions, but it would effectively accelerate the free exchange of art ideas and cultural thought, from which our Nation as a whole stands greatly to benefit.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that this legislation will receive the wide support of a great many of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA LEGISLATION

The SPEAKER. This is District of Columbia Day. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCMILLAN] is recognized.

GEORGE MASON MEMORIAL BRIDGE

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H.R. 5534) to designate the bridge to be constructed over the Potomac River near 14th Street in the District of Columbia, under the act of July 16, 1946, as the George Mason Memorial Bridge, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this cost any money?

Mr. McMILLAN. It does not. It only names the bridge.

Mr. GROSS. It does not provide for the construction of another bridge across the Potomac River at the expense of all the taxpayers?

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir. That was provided for in 1956. This just names the bridge.

Mr. GROSS. Does this bill provide for some kind of a celebration once the bridge is completed.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not know anything about a celebration. It will be 2 or 3 years before the bridge is built.

Mr. GROSS. It is contemplated, according to the last paragraph of the bill, to hold suitable ceremonies in connection with naming of the bridge and I want to make sure that will not cost the taxpayers any money.

Mr. McMILLAN. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman will state definitely that it will not cost any money when they get around to celebrate completion of the bridge?

Mr. McMILLAN. Perhaps the gentleman from Virginia can answer the gentleman.

Mr. BROYHILL. It is provided for following the completion of the bridge. It is rather confusing what we mean by "the 14th Street Bridge," because there are two of them. Last year we named the incoming northbound 14th Street Bridge as the Rochambeau Bridge and they had appropriate unveiling ceremonies designating it as such. This bill provides for the naming of the old 14th Street Bridge as the George Mason Bridge, and it is provided for an unveiling celebration. I will not say it will not cost any money, but I do not think the cost of such a ceremony is an undesirable cost.

Mr. GROSS. With that response I would like to put the House on notice now that it may expect a bill later on. The bridge ought to have a name, but I see no reason why all the taxpayers of the country should provide the money to hold a celebration to open this bridge.

Congress does not provide money for the opening of a toll bridge across the Mississippi River that is built by private enterprise and paid for by those who use it; the Federal Government does not spend money, nor should it, for any such ceremonies in the Midwest, and I know of no reason why the taxpayers of Iowa should be called upon to pay for any ceremony in connection with this bridge or any other bridge across the Potomac.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection, but I want to serve notice here and now that if I am a Member of Congress when this bridge is completed I will oppose the appropriation of a single dime of taxpayer money for the bridge-naming celebration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the bridge to be constructed over the Potomac River from a point near Fourteenth Street in the District of Columbia to a point in Virginia, under authority of the Act entitled "An Act authorizing and directing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to construct two four-lane bridges to replace the existing Fourteenth Street or Highway Bridge across the Potomac River, and for other purposes", approved July 16, 1946 (60 Stat. 566), shall be known and designated as the "George Mason Memorial Bridge". Any law, regulation, map, document, record, or other paper of the United States in which such bridge is referred to shall be held to refer to such bridge as the "George Mason Memorial Bridge".

SEC. 2. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall—

(1) place on the George Mason Memorial Bridge a name plaque of suitable and appropriate design; and

(2) in connection with the opening of such bridge to the public, provide for suitable ceremonies honoring George Mason, the American statesman of the Revolutionary War period from the State of Virginia, who drafted the renowned Virginia Declaration of Rights which became the basis for the first ten amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, section 1 of the bill provides that the bridge which will replace the existing 14th Street or Highway Bridge across the Potomac River shall be known and designated as the "George Mason Memorial Bridge."

Section 2 provides that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall, first, place on such bridge a name plaque of suitable and appropriate design; and second, in connection with the opening of such bridge to the public, to provide suitable ceremonies honoring George Mason, the American statesman of the Revolutionary War period from the State of Virginia, who drafted the Virginia Declaration of Rights which became the basis for the first 10 amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE LIFE INSURANCE ACT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia I call up the bill (H.R. 1844) to amend the Life Insurance Act of the District of Columbia approved June 19, 1934, as amended by the acts of July 2, 1940, and July 12, 1950, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 10(1) of chapter V of the Life Insurance Act, as amended (sec. 35–710(1), D.C. Code, 1951 edition), is amended (1) by striking out "twenty-five employees" in subsection (c) thereof, and inserting in lieu thereof "ten employees", and (2) by striking out the period at the end of subsection (d) thereof and adding the following: "unless 150 per centum of the annual compensation of a covered employee exceeds $20,000, in which event all such insurance shall not exceed $40,000, or 150 per centum of such annual compensation, whichever is less."

SEC. 2. Section 10(3) of chapter V of the Life Insurance Act, as amended (sec. 35–710(3), D.C. Code, 1951 edition), is amended (1) by striking out the words "twenty-five members" in subsection (c) thereof and inserting in lieu thereof "ten members", and (2) by deleting "issued to the union" in the second sentence of subsection (d), and (3) by striking out the period at the end of subsection (d) thereof and adding the following: "unless 150 per centum of the annual compensation of a covered union member exceeds $20,000, in which event all such insurance shall not exceed $40,000, or 150 per centum of such annual compensation, whichever is less."

SEC. 3. Section 10(4) of chapter V of the Life Insurance Act, as amended (sec. 35–710(4), D.C. Code, 1951 edition), is amended by striking out the period at the end of subsection (d) thereof and adding the following: "unless 150 per centum of the annual compensation of a covered person exceeds $20,000, in which event all such insurance shall not exceed $40,000, or 150 per centum of such annual compensation, whichever is less."

SEC. 4. Section 10(5) of chapter V of the Life Insurance Act, as amended (sec. 35–710(5), D.C. Code, 1951 edition), is amended by striking out "fifty employees" and inserting in lieu thereof, "ten employees."

SEC. 5. Section 10 (generally) of chapter V of the Life Insurance Act, as amended (sec. 35–710, D.C. Code, 1951 edition), is amended by adding the following two new subsections, subsections 6 and 7:

"(6) A policy issued to an association which has been organized and is maintained for purposes other than that of obtaining insurance, which shall be deemed the policyholder, to insure members, or employees of members, of such association for the benefit of persons other than the association, or any of its officials, representatives, or agents, subject to the following requirements:

"(a) The members or employees eligible for insurance under the policy shall be all the members, and all the employees of the members, of the associations, or all of any class or classes thereof determined by conditions pertaining to their employment, or to membership in the association, or both.

"(b) The premium for the policy shall be paid by the policyholder either wholly from the association's funds, or partly from such funds and partly from funds contributed by the insured members or employees specifically for their insurance, or from funds wholly contributed by the insured members or employees specifically for their insurance. A policy on which any part or all of the premium is to be derived from funds contributed by the insured members or employees specifically for their insurance may be placed in force only if at least 60 per centum of the then eligible members or employees or a minimum of four hundred members, whichever is less, excluding any as to whom evidence of individual insurability is not satisfactory to the insured, elect to make the required contributions. A policy on which no part of the premium is to be derived from funds contributed by the insured members specifically for their insurance must insure all eligible members or employees, or all except any as to whom evidence of individual insurability is not satisfactory to the insurer.

"(c) The policy must cover at least twenty-five members or employees at date of issuance.

"(d) The amounts of insurance under the policy must be based on some plan precluding individual selection either by the members or employees, or by the association. No policy may be issued which provides term insurance on any association member or employee which, together with any other term insurance under any group life insurance policy or policies, exceeds $20,000, unless 150 per centum of the annual compensation of such person exceeds $20,000, in which event all such term insurance shall not exceed $40,000, or 150 per centum of such annual compensation, whichever is less.

"(7) Any policy issued pursuant to this section, except a policy issued to a creditor pursuant to subsection (2) hereof, may be extended to insure the spouses and minor children of insured persons, or any class or classes thereof, subject to the following requirements:

"(a) The premiums for the insurance shall be paid by the policyholder either from the policyholder's funds or from funds contributed by the insured person, or from both. If any part of the premium is to be derived from funds contributed by the insured persons, the insurance with respect to spouses and children may be placed in force only if at least 75 per centum of the then eligible employees or association members, excluding any as to whose family members evidence of insurability is not satisfactory to the insurer, elect to make the required contribution. If no part of the premium is to be derived from funds contributed by the insured persons, all such eligible employees or association members, excluding any as to whose family members evidence of insurability is not satisfactory to the insurer, must be insured with respect to their spouses and children.

"(b) The amounts of insurance under the policy must be based upon some plan precluding individual selection either by the insured persons or by the policyholder, and shall not exceed with respect to any spouse or child, 50 per centum of the insurance on the life of such insured person.

"(c) Upon termination of the insurance with respect to the spouse of any insured person by reason of such person's termination of employment or membership or death, the spouse insured pursuant to this section shall have the same conversion rights as to the insurance on his or her life as is provided for the insured person under section 35–711.

"(d) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 35–711, only one certificate need be issued for delivery to an insured person if a statement concerning any dependent's coverage is included in such certificate."

With the following committee amendments:

On page 4, line 6, after the word "members" insert the phrase "or employees".

On page 4, line 9, strike the word "insured" and insert the word "insurer".

On page 4, line 11, after the word "members" insert the phrase "or employees".

On page 6, lines 9 and 10, strike "35–711" and insert in lieu thereof "11".

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, the District of Columbia Life Insurance Act presently authorizes, first, the issuance to an employer or to the trustee of a fund established by an employer of a group life insurance policy covering a group of at least 25 employees; second, the issuance to a labor union of a group life insurance policy covering at least 25 union members; third, the issuance to the trustees of a fund established by two or more employers in the same industry or by one or more labor unions, or by one or more employers and one or more labor unions of a group life insurance policy covering at least 100 persons and not less than an average of five persons per employer unit; and fourth, the issuance to certain designated Government officials of group life insurance policies covering at least 50 Government employees. In the cases of the first three classes of persons described above, the amount of insurance coverage per person may not exceed $20,000. Existing law does not now authorize an association which has been organized and is maintained for purposes other than that of obtaining insurance to be issued a group life insurance policy nor does existing law provide for the inclusion in any such policy of spouses and minor children of insured persons.

H.R. 1844 amends the act to authorize the issuance to an employer or trustee of a fund established by an employer, to labor unions, to trustees for one or more labor unions, two or more employers, or one or more employers and one or more labor unions, and to certain designated Government officials, group life insurance policies covering a minimum of ten persons. The bill also increases the limitation of insurance coverage from $20,000 to $40,000. Further, associations which have been organized and are maintained for purposes other than obtaining insurance are made eligible to be issued policies of group life insurance. The coverage of such policies may, under the bill, be extended to include the spouses and minor children of the insured persons.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this time would not be taken, but a letter was received this morning, enclosing a newspaper clipping that reads:

CONGRESSIONAL PAY ISN'T CHICKEN FEED

(By Inez Robb)

In the current congressional Easter recess, Members of the Senate and House are back home, so I read, trying to get a whiff of the political climate and taking the pulse of the electorate.

So far, my Congressman, much less my Senator, has not been around to lay ary finger on my pulse. But if either shows up, he'll find my pulse jumping like a yo-yo. And I'll be real happy to tell him why.

It isn't so much the present widespread revelations of nepotism (or me-and-my family firstism) that has my pulse leaping like a trout stream—there are chiselers in every profession—as what it all adds up to.

And what it adds up to is that American Congressmen are among the most highly paid and most lightly taxed executives in the country.

Frankly, I feel like a nitwit that for years I have swallowed the surface fact that Senators and Members of the House receive a flat salary of $22,500 annually.

The truth is that Congressmen receive from three to eight times that sum, for they belong to that most-privileged and lordly of all modern financial categories, the expense-account aristocracy.

Including all their extraordinary perquisites, which they have voted themselves over the years, the congressional take-home pay, the great majority of it tax exempt, ranges anywhere from $70,000 to more than $180,000 annually.

The Congress has been shrewd enough to vote itself a flat salary of $22,500 and to take the rest of its big, fat cut in the form of expenses, which are tax exempt.

The Congress has made it as difficult as possible for the public to assay the swag connected with membership in the club.

By law, the Members of the House are limited to $37,000 annually for secretarial help. The House recently put on the pressure to up that sum by another $14,500 for another administrative assistant.

And remember, fellow voter, all this lovely expense account money is tax exempt. And you really ain't heard nothing yet. Of course, you have read about the $1,200 annual allowance received by each Congressman for an office in his home town. Ah, those glassed-in front porches.

In Washington, each Congressman occupies a luxurious suite, in either the Senate or House Office Buildings, suites sometimes as large as seven rooms. Of course, the furniture and equipment of these offices are on Uncle Sam, too. (Remember the story recently about the number of congressional typewriters that have disappeared?)

The commercial rent on such splendid offices (and how vulgar of me to turn commercial) in a city as crowded as Washington, D.C., would be very costly, indeed, if a Congressman were forced to pay his way.

Then $3,000 of the $22,500 of acknowledged salary is tax exempt because of the "hardship" being forced to maintain a residence in Washington, D.C.

Note this paragraph:

And what it adds up to is that American Congressmen are among the most highly paid and most lightly taxed executives in the country.

Now, it seems to me that statement would be of interest to all of us. I am sure it will be of interest to people who are thinking of running for office.

Here is another quote:

Frankly, I feel like a nitwit. That for years I have swallowed the surface fact that Senators and Members of the House receive a flat salary of $22,500 annually.

Now, what this young lady—and I think she is young and beautiful—put in the press is amazing—if she has been around here for some time and is a young lady of discernment. That she did not know until recently what Congressmen are getting is most amazing, to me, especially from the Detroit Free Press. I know of the Detroit Free Press. The father of the editor, John Knight—and he has, I understand, three great papers—was once a Congressman from the Akron, Ohio, district, and, presumably, John S. himself is at least slightly interested in Congressmen, their qualifications—incidentally, their compensation. I know the Detroit Free Press has good people—a most excellent reporter in Jim Haswell. He is on the ball all the time. He gets the news when it is news, and very accurately. I have never noticed any venom in his reports. But this girl—I assume she is a girl—just does not know what we are getting for the duties we are presumed to do.

Listen to this. She wrote:

The truth is that Congressmen receive from three to eight times that sum, for they belong to that most-privileged and lordly of all modern financial categories, the expense-account aristocracy.

Now, if any of you have been in any doubt about what your take-home pay is, check up on this statement of Inez.

Where in the world does the dear lady get that kind of misinformation? If in doubt, she should have checked. Can anyone estimate the misunderstanding, the envy, that statements of that kind cause among the people of our districts? Perhaps some have known exactly what a Congressman receives. When they read this statement in the Detroit Free Press that some of us get $70,000, some $180,000, they see it "black on white" and, with the other misleading statements they read, straightaway conclude that the Congressmen who tell them, when asked, the true amount of their compensation, are liars.

While Inez may be young, she may also be old enough to remember that there was a day when the people, reading a newspaper, were of the opinion that the statements therein were true.

Now, I had a lame back for quite some time. My colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT] has been here so long and he was limping around a little while ago. Maybe he and I had bad backs, that is, from carrying that money home, all of that $180,000. If they paid us in Lincoln pennies, it sure was some load. I do not know where Inez has been—upstairs, or down, eating. She sure did not get the facts right. I hope that the Detroit Free Press management will call her attention to the necessity of being approximately accurate because some folks read that paper and certainly Mr. Knight does not want his readers deceived. If his news stories are untrue no one will believe his editorials.

She states further:

The Congress has been shrewd enough to vote itself a flat salary of $22,500 and to take the rest of its big, fat cut in the form of expenses, which are tax exempt.

She should know better. Why mislead on that item? But just why does she charge us with getting tax-exempt sums when the record shows otherwise? If I said she weighed 50 pounds more than she does, would she be mad?

She states:

The Congress has made it as difficult as possible for the public to assay the swag connected with membership of the club.

May I ask my friend from Iowa [Mr. GROSS], What is the meaning of "swag"? What does that mean as Inez uses it?

Swag means "booty, boodle, plunder, also spoils," and, of course, Inez knows the meaning of the term. Sure, the Congressmen have their failings, as do a few other people. But after all, this is the people's Congress and one of the good things about the people is that even the sassiest, dirty-faced little brat is, by his mother, thought to be quite a child.

May I plead with Inez, in my behalf if in behalf of no one else. We are bad enough. Do not make us any worse than we are.

She also wrote:

By law, the Members of the House are limited to $37,000 annually for secretarial help. The House recently put on the pressure to up that sum by another $14,500 for another administrative assistant.

If I ever get one, I am going to lend him to Inez so that she may get the facts, write a true report. She needs information not imagination. A paper that continues to print fancy rather than facts soon loses the confidence of its readers.

She goes on to say:

And remember, fellow voter, all this lovely expense account money is tax exempt.

Of course, you have read about the $1,200 annual allowance received by each Congressman for an office in his home town.

Ah, those glassed-in front porches.

Bless your heart, dear Inez, you would be one of the first to kick if the Congressman did not ask you to be seated when you called in his home town—just what and the sum total of expense items would you allow, Inez?

Neither you nor the Detroit Free Press nor the other papers pays any gallery rent, but Inez, you have been sitting up there in the comfortable press gallery and on those nice, soft cushions while waiting for a timid Congressman to leave the floor at your finger-crooking to answer your call in the hope you would send on a good word to your paper. So why do you let out an unladylike squawk?

Instead of worrying and complaining about the furniture used in the Capitol which the Congressmen are permitted to use, Inez might give a little thought to the fact that she is treated in the same way when in the Capitol. If she does not watch her step, she will get sore just sitting around waiting for something to happen. The services she gets are all tax free.

Surely she wants to leave us enough so that, when we come on the floor or down in the well, we will not be arrested for not being properly dressed.

She states further on:

In Washington, each Congressman occupies a luxurious suite, in either the Senate or House Office Buildings, suites sometimes as large as seven rooms.

You boys with seven rooms, let us know where they are. She says "seven rooms." Go over to my office and find out. I have tried to wriggle the Speaker out of a nice place up in front, but he keeps me in a back corner. I am glad he does because there are three windows on one side of my office. Of course, there are a couple of girls in there, but I do not mind that, although it is a little embarrassing sometimes when folks from back home come in, like the six or seven who came in this morning. But, we all get along and some way the work gets done. I wish, however, you distinguished Members of the House who have seven rooms would let us know where they are and how any of us can get them.

Of course, the furniture and equipment of these offices are on Uncle Sam, too.

She sits up there and pounds a Government typewriter, she and the rest of the reporters; lolls back in a comfortable chair, has a cigarette tray handy if she wants one, a glass of cool, clear water waiting in the hand of a Congressman if she wants it. I wish some of these boys and girls who are so critical of Congressmen would get a looking-glass—I will help pay for it—and take a look at themselves every morning before coming to work and see how much better they are than the rest of us—then be just a little charitable.

Ah, yes, furniture. Inez even complains about the furniture. I bought two surplus desks for the office one day and I would bet, if I was a betting man, when I go home pretty quick and take them along, someone will accuse me of stealing them.

Typewriters. Inez wrote:

Remember the story recently about the number of congressional typewriters that have disappeared?

Is a Congressman to blame if any are gone or once in a while a reporter lets one stick to his fingers? I do not think so. I have not the slightest idea that it happened. Inez writes:

The commercial rent on such splendid offices (and how vulgar of me to turn commercial) in a city as crowded as Washington, D.C., would be very costly, indeed, if a Congressman were forced to pay his way.

Do they want us to rent space here? And, Inez, I have a home in Allegan, Mich. Wife and I built it 59 years ago—house and lot, $1,200—rent one here for $110 a month. Inez, if I was getting $180,000 a year, tax free, I might think of paying $120 a month.

Writes Inez:

Then $3,000 of the $22,500 of acknowledged salary is tax exempt.

Poor dear. She does not know all she is writing about.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ATTACHMENT AND GARNISHMENT OF WAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 836) to amend the code of law for the District of Columbia by modifying the provisions relating to the attachment and garnishment of wages, salaries, and commissions of judgment debtors, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act entitled "An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, as amended, is amended by inserting after section 1104 thereof a new section as follows:

"SEC. 1104A. ATTACHMENT OF WAGES.—(a) Notwithstanding any other provision of this chapter, where an attachment is levied upon wages due a judgment debtor from an employer-garnishee, such attachment shall become a lien and a continuing levy upon the gross wages due or to become due to the judgment debtor for the amount specified in the attachment to the extent of (1) 10 per centum of so much of the gross wages as does not exceed $200 due or to become due to the judgment debtor from the employer-garnishee for the pay period or periods ending in any calendar month, plus (2) 20 per centum of so much of the gross wages as exceeds $200 but does not exceed $500 due or to become due to the judgment debtor from the employer-garnishee for the pay period or periods ending in any calendar month, plus (3) 50 per centum of so much of the gross wages as exceeds $500 due or to become due to the judgment debtor from the employer-garnishee for the pay period or periods ending in any calendar month. Such levy shall be a continuing levy until the judgment, interest, and costs thereof are fully satisfied and paid, and in no event shall moneys be withheld, by the employer-garnishee from the judgment debtor, in amounts greater than those prescribed by this section. Only one attachment upon the wages of a judgment debtor shall be satisfied at one time. Where more than one attachment is issued upon the wages of the same judgment debtor and served upon the same employer-garnishee, the attachment first delivered to the marshall shall have priority, and all subsequent attachments shall be satisfied in the order of priority set forth in section 452 of this Act.

"(b) It shall be the duty and responsibility of any employer upon whom an attachment is served, and who at such time is indebted for wages to an employee who is the judgment debtor named in such attachment, or who becomes so indebted to such judgment debtor in the future and while such attachment remains a lien upon such indebtedness, to withhold and pay to the judgment creditor, or his legal representative, within fifteen days after the close of the last pay period of the judgment debtor ending in each calendar month, that percentage of the gross wages payable to the judgment debtor for the pay period or periods ending in such calendar month to which the judgment creditor is entitled under the terms of this section until such attachment is wholly satisfied: Provided, That upon written notice of any court proceeding attacking such attachment or the judgment on which it is based, the employer shall make no further payments to the judgment creditor or his legal representative until receipt of an order of court terminating such proceedings. Any payments made by an employer-garnishee in conformity with this subsection shall be a discharge of the liability of the employer to the judgment debtor to the extent of such payment. Under this subsection the employer-garnishee shall not withhold or pay over more than 10 per centum of the gross wages payable to the judgment debtor for any pay period ending in any calendar month until the total amount of gross wages paid or payable to the judgment debtor for all pay periods ending in such calendar month equals $200, nor more than 20 per centum of the gross wages in excess of $200 payable to the judgment debtor for any pay period ending in any calendar month until the total amount of gross wages paid or payable to the judgment debtor for all pay periods ending in such calendar month equals $500.

"(c) It shall be the duty and responsibility of the judgment creditor (1) to file with the clerk of the court, every three months after the serving of an attachment, a receipt showing the amount received and the balance due under the attachment as of the date of filing, and (2) to file a final receipt with the court, furnish a copy thereof to the employer-garnishee, and to obtain a vacation of the attachment within twenty days after the attachment has been satisfied. If the judgment creditor fails to file any of the receipts prescribed in this subsection, any interested party may move the court to compel the defaulting judgment creditor to appear in court and make an accounting forthwith. The court may, in its discretion, enter judgment for any damages, including a reasonable attorney's fee, suffered by, and tax costs in favor of, the party filing the motion to compel the accounting.

"(d) If the employer-garnishee willfully fails to pay to the judgment creditor the percentages prescribed in this section of the wages which become payable to the judgment debtor for any pay period, judgment shall be entered against him for the whole amount of the judgment creditor's judgment, interest, and costs and execution shall be had thereon except that in no event shall judgment be entered against the employer-garnishee in an amount greater than the gross wages which became payable to the judgment debtor for the pay period or periods with respect to which the employer-garnishee willfully failed to pay to the judgment creditor the percentages prescribed in this section. If the employer-garnishee fails—but not willfully, to pay to the judgment creditor the percentages prescribed in this section of the wages which become payable to the judgment debtor for any pay period, judgment shall be entered against him for an amount equal to the percentages with respect to which such failure occurs.

"(e) If a judgment debtor resigns or is dismissed from his employment while an attachment upon his wages is wholly or partly unsatisfied, such attachment shall lapse and no further deduction shall be made thereon unless the judgment debtor is reinstated or reemployed within ninety days after such resignation or dismissal.

"(f) For purposes of this section, the term 'wages' means—

"(1) wages, salary, commissions, or other remuneration for services performed by an employee for his employer, including any such remuneration measured partly or wholly by percentages or share of profits, or by other sums based upon work done or results produced, whether or not the employee is given a drawing account, and

"(2) any drawing account made available to an employee by his employer.

The term wages shall not include any amount paid or payable to an employee who is not a resident of the District of Columbia as remuneration for services performed within the District of Columbia, if the period for which the employee is engaged by the employer to perform such services within the District of Columbia is less than fifteen consecutive days' duration; and any such amount shall be subject to attachment without regard to this section.

"(g) The per centum limitations prescribed by subsection (a) of this section shall not apply in the case of execution upon a judgment, order, or decree of any court of the District of Columbia for the payment of any sum for the support of maintenance of a person's wife, or former wife, or children, and any such execution, judgment, order, or decree shall, in the discretion of the court, have priority over any other execution which is subject to the provisions of this section.

"(h) No attachment issued by the municipal court for the District of Columbia upon a judgment of such court duly docketed in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, and levied within 6 years from the date of such judgment upon the wages due or to become due to the judgment debtor from the employer-garnishee, shall lapse or become invalid prior to complete satisfaction solely by reason of the expiration of the period of limitation set forth in section 4(c) of the Act of April 1, 1942 (56 Stat. 193; D.C. Code 11–755).

"(i) Where the judgment debtor claims or is proved to be rendering services to or employed by a relative or other person or by a corporation owned or controlled by a relative or other person, without salary or compensation, or at a salary or compensation so inadequate as to satisfy the court that such salary or compensation is merely colorable and designed to defraud or impede the creditors of such debtor, the court may direct such debtor to make payments on account of the judgment, in installments, based upon a reasonable value of the service rendered by such judgment debtor under his said employment or upon said debtor's then earning ability.

"(j) Where an attachment levied under section 1104A is based upon a judgment obtained by default or consent without a trial upon the merits, the court, upon motion of any interested person, may quash such attachment upon satisfactory proof that such judgment was obtained without just cause and solely for the purpose of preventing or delaying the satisfaction of just claims."

SEC. 2. Subsection (b) of section 1089 of the Act entitled "An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D.C. Code 15–304), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "This subsection shall not apply with respect to an attachment upon wages to which section 1104A of this Act applies."

SEC. 3. Section 1098 of such Act, as amended (D.C. Code 15–312), is amended by striking out "If" and inserting in lieu thereof "Subject to the provisions of section 1104A of this Act, If".

SEC. 4. Section 1107 of such Act, as amended (D.C. Code 15–403), is amended—

(a) by striking out "earnings, salary" each place it appears in subsections (a) and (b) and inserting in lieu thereof "earnings (other than wages, as defined in section 1104A);" and

(b) by striking out "salaries" in the proviso in subsection (a).

SEC. 5. (a) Section 456 of such Act, as amended (D.C. Code 16–312), is amended by adding at the end thereof as follows:

"(c) Any attachment issued under section 445 of this Act solely on the ground that the defendant is not a resident of the District of Columbia and levied upon wages as defined in section 1104A(f) shall be subject to the provisions of section 1104A of this Act, except that the employer-garnishee shall pay over the wages withheld pursuant to such section only pursuant to the order of the court which has jurisdiction of the case. In applying the provisions of such section to any such attachment, the term 'judgment debtor' as used in such section shall be considered to refer to the defendant in the case in which such attachment is issued; and the term 'judgment creditor' shall be considered to refer to the plaintiff in such case."

(b) Subsection (b) of such section 456 is amended by striking out "Wages" and inserting in lieu thereof "earnings".

SEC. 6. The amendments made by this Act shall apply only with respect to attachments upon wages (as defined in section 1104A(f) of this Act) which are issued on or after sixty days from the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 7. If any section, subdivision, or clause of section 1104A shall be held to be invalid, the remainder of the Act shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 8. The judges of the municipal court for the District of Columbia and of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia shall establish such rules of procedure for their respective courts as may be necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Act.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 5, line 3 following "(d)", strike the following: "If the employer-garnishee willfully fails to pay to the judgment creditor the percentages prescribed in this section of the wages which become payable to the judgment debtor for any pay period, judgment shall be entered against him for the whole amount of the judgment creditor's judgment, interest, and costs, and execution shall be had thereon except that in no event shall judgment be entered against the employer-garnishee in an amount greater than the gross wages which became payable to the judgment debtor for the pay period or periods with respect to which the employer-garnishee willfully failed to pay to the judgment creditor the percentages prescribed in this section."

On page 5, line 15, strike the comma and the following: "but not willfully".

On page 7, line 5, after the period, add the following: "In the case of execution upon such a judgment, order, or decree for the payment of such sum for support or maintenance, the limitation shall be 50 per centum of the gross wages due or to become due to any such person for the pay period or periods ending in any calendar month."

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, under existing law in the District of Columbia a judgment creditor may issue an attachment of a debtor's wages called a garnishment, which garnishment requires that the employer withhold all of the debtor's wages until it can be judicially determined how much of the attached wages should be turned over to the creditor.

Under existing law if an exemption is claimed the debtor is required to file a written claim of exemption which claim is set down for a hearing in open court at which the debtor must be present. During the time this hearing is pending the entire wages are still held up.

The exemption provided for under present law is unworkable and economically unsound in that the majority of defendants never take advantage of it, and it promotes a coercive influence on defendants due to the holdup of the defendant's salary until the litigation is determined.

There are approximately 3,500 cases of garnishment heard before the municipal court of the District of Columbia every month.

The purpose of H.R. 836 is to provide an attachment on wages of a judgment debtor's earnings to the extent of 10 percent of gross wages not exceeding $200 per month, 20 percent of gross wages over $200 but not exceeding $500 per month, and 50 percent of gross wages exceeding $500 per month, until the judgment is fully paid.

The provisions of this bill shall be effective as to wages, salary, and commissions of an employee-judgment debtor on or after the date of the enactment of this act.

A subcommittee of the House District Committee held hearings on H.R. 836 on March 4, 9, and 16, 1959. At the time the hearings were held the chief judge of the municipal court of the District of Columbia appeared, and other judges of the municipal court, the corporation counsel for the District of Columbia, representatives of the District of Columbia Bar Association, and many other interested public citizens who testified in favor of this bill. There were a number of individuals who appeared and testified in opposition to H.R. 836 or any other bill which would amend the law relating to attachment or garnishment on wages, salaries, and commissions in the District of Columbia. It might be well to point out that these persons who testified against amending the present law were representatives of various businesses who have extended credit in what could be called a reckless manner to the very individuals who were always brought into court with these proceedings.

The purpose in the amendment on page 5, line 3, following subsection (d) and on page 5, line 15, striking out the words "but not willfully" would reduce punishment for employers who failed to deduct attachments from debtor employees' checks. The Bar Association of the District of Columbia wanted such employers liable for payment of the total debt under attachment. The committee limited the employers' liability to an amount equal to the payment he failed to make.

The purpose of the amendment on page 7, line 15, adds a new sentence and is explained as follows:

Subsection (a) of the new section 1104A provides there shall be certain percentage limitations on the amount which shall become a lien and levy on gross wages due a judgment debtor. Such percentage limitations vary depending upon the amount of the gross wages of the debtor.

Subsection (g) provides that these percentage limitations shall not apply in the case of a judgment order or decree for payment of sums for the support or maintenance of a person's wife, a former wife or children. Thus it would seem to be possible for all of the debtor's wages to be attached on this type of case.

The purpose of the amendment is to provide that not more than 50 percent of the gross wages due the judgment debtor can be attached in the case of execution upon this type of judgment order or decree. This 50 percent limitation is without regard to the amount of the gross wages due the debtor.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 3648) to regulate the handling of student funds in Indian schools operated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Line 7, after "Affairs" insert "in accordance with the purposes of such deposits."

Line 7, after "deposits" insert "and disbursements."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DEFENSE FACILITIES PROTECTION ACT OF 1959

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, the Department of Defense has for many years urged the Congress to enact legislation which will allow the removal of persons within the defense organization who are a threat to the security of our country.

At the present time there are individuals employed with organizations performing services for the Department of Defense who are known to be or to have been members of the Communist Party.

The legal authority of the Department of Defense presently is limited to the protection of classified information or material in the possession of the Department of Defense. Based on this authority, access to such classified information or materials is denied to persons who are determined under appropriate rules and regulations to be security risks. This authority does not extend, however, to the removal of potentially dangerous individuals from facilities where unclassified, though highly important defense work, is being performed; or to removal of such individuals from support facilities such as powerplants, basic material plants, and transportation facilities.

One of the most significant areas where this problem exists is in the communications field. At the present time, vital communication facilities of the Defense Department are under the control of a union known as the American Communications Association.

In testimony developed by the House Committee on Un-American Activities, in hearings held in 1957, it has been conclusively established that this union was expelled from the AFL-CIO due to its being dominated by the Communist Party. Members of this union, many of whom took the fifth amendment when asked about their affiliation with the Communist Party, are in a position to intercept vital defense messages which may issue or be received by the Department of Defense.

The legislation I have introduced will give the Department of Defense authority to remove these security threats from sensitive positions.

There is no room in our defense structure for anyone who is a member of or sympathetic to the Communist Party. It is shocking to know that this type of individual can today legally penetrate our defense organization.

I feel very proud and honored as an American to be able to join with some of my colleagues, in introducing this legislation in an effort to further shore up our defenses.

THE HOUSING BILL AND OUR RESPONSIBILITY TO POSTERITY

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. HIESTAND] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, unpaid bills and crushing national debts, if passed on to our children, will surely boomerang. Those children will bitterly condemn their reckless forebears. Even today, constituents are becoming concerned about the future of the American economy. With alarm they are catching on to the Democrat trick of backdoor spending.

No generation should live for itself alone. Our sole objective should be saving this Nation for the generations to come.

In other words it should be "what's best for our country" rather than the lust for immediate power by spending, spending, and spending the Republic into disaster.

There is a clear difference between the Republican and Democrat Parties, despite all this talk about a new image. Nearly a century ago, Abraham Lincoln summed up the Republican perspective:

> Fellow citizens, we cannot escape history. * * * The fiery trial through which we pass will light us down in honor or dishonor to the latest generation. * * * We shall nobly save or meanly lose the last best hope of earth.

The Republicans have heeded and the Democrats have ignored this exhortation to be responsible to posterity. The Republicans preach fiscal discipline and austerity today in order that our children shall inherit economic freedom, prosperity, and progress tomorrow.

The Democrats, on the other hand, continue their extravagance with the public money and apparently think that the public can be bought. They forget the cruel and crushing burden that the debts for their excesses will place upon all our children years hence.

The Republicans want every American family to have good housing. But this does not mean an extravagant, ill-conceived housing program that is going to create such national debts that those same families would one day curse the authors of the seemingly good program.

Those politicians who subscribe to the Democrat spending philosophy deny that there is any parallel between a family-balanced budget and a Federal-balanced budget. Although admitting that every tenet of common sense demands that a family live within its means, they claim that such common sense does not apply to the Nation.

I would like to live in a bigger and better house myself. To have this luxury, however, if I have to assume a crushing mortgage which after my death would bankrupt my wife and children, I want no part of the new house.

The Democrats have completely misunderstood grass-roots sentiments across the Nation when they claim that the public favors massive housing programs charged off to future years. The many polls clearly demonstrate that the Nation is on the side of the balanced budget. The citizens of this country do see a parallel between public fiscal responsibility and private fiscal responsibility, whether the Democrat politicians do or not.

It is responsible, however, to spend for housing money that we do have. This is exactly what President Eisenhower has advocated in the administration's housing bill. Economy in Government does not mean no spending, but it means spending within the framework of the balanced budget. It means paying as you go, and not as your children go.

Plainly, the difference between an extravagant and a progressive economy is the difference between the committee housing bill and the administration housing bill. The committee bill would ultimately spend $6 billion and unbalance our budgets. The administration's bill would ultimately spend $1.65 billion and keep the budgets balanced.

If the Democrats will truly decide to face history rather than escape history, they would become more concerned about adding a burdening indebtedness to the lot of those who come after us. Was it not this type of flabby, indolent, unconcerned attitude that led to the decline and fall of the once great Roman and Spanish empires? As the Teutonic tribes challenged the supremacy of Rome, and as the French and English challenged the supremacy of Spain, so today the Soviet Union challenges America for world leadership.

Stalin declared:

> Thus in the course of further development of international revolution two centers will form on a world scale: a socialistic center, binding to itself the countries that gravitate to socialism, and a capitalist center, binding to itself the countries that gravitate to capitalism. The struggle between these two centers for the possession of the world economy will decide the fate of capitalism and communism in the whole world.

In this hour of challenge, will Americans respond by spending and squandering borrowed money and by making still other loans? Is this flight from reality and escape from hardships the way that the early American settlers met the problems of their day and cradled a great and free civilization for us?

Clearly, no missile and no submarine can protect a nation against burrowing communism when that nation lets its economic muscle turn into such excess fat.

What alarms me is that many Democrats have rationalized their way out of what is called, in plain language, extravagance. Leon Keyserling seems to be the fountainhead of the spending theories. The bigger the national debt, he seems to feel, the better off is the Nation's economy. That a country can spend its way into a greater gross national product is a pure speculation totally without historical foundation or current justification.

Since 1913 Government spending has risen about 50 times, according to the Tax Foundation. If Keyserling's theories were right, the gross national product should have multiplied dozens of times during that time. But the hard fact that the gross national product rose only 11 times during those years indicates how wrong Keyserling's ideas are.

Mr. Speaker, this may shock a few Members, but Henri de La Chapelle, an able economic consultant, has calculated that because of inflation and taxes a single person:

To match a 1939 income of—	One had to have in 1957—	But the way things are going, 1975 income must be—
$2,000	$4,810	$10,540
4,000	10,100	24,420
7,500	21,180	58,000
15,000	54,210	128,000
25,000	85,000	255,000
50,000	333,380	835,390

To my way of thinking, the majority leader of the other body has issued a wise warning about slipshod ideas that have never worked:

> We cannot afford to go broke in tinkering with our economic system merely because an idea is appealing or attractive. The ideas must be tested in the market place of ideas.

Overseas the need for financial discipline within nations is becoming more and more discussed. In Europe and South America, creditors have been telling France, Argentina, Chile, Turkey, and other countries that they are living beyond their means and that runaway deficit spending is heading them toward disaster. The principal creditors are agencies like the International Monetary Fund.

France, Argentina, and Turkey have responded with austerity programs that may mean less luxury benefits for their people today but will mean greater financial stability and prosperity decades hence. Dire necessity has made these hard pressed countries abhor such theories as those of Keyserling and the Democrat Advisory Council. How critical does the financial condition of this country have to be before the Democrats will cast off these irresponsible philosophies and respond as have the people of France, Argentina, and Turkey?

The creditors in the United States are not agencies like the International Monetary Fund. The creditors are you and I, as well as the widowed and the retired—all those who have purchased Government bonds. And people like us are not buying as many bonds as they once did. This wild deficit spending does not have the confidence of the people. American workers and housewives have become educated to the robbery which is known as inflation; they are worried that interest payments on the debt are the second-largest budgetary expenditure. As has been often pointed out, at the rate we are going, by about 1987 we shall have spent in interest the total amount of the debt, and we shall still owe the debt.

I shall now treat some major objections to the Senate-passed housing bill and the House subcommittee housing bill.

First of all, both bills are exorbitant and excessive. The Senate housing bill would authorize commitments and ultimate expenditures of $3½ billion. The House bill would amount to $5.8 billion. Of these authorized budget expenditures, only $575 million could ever be recovered. Thus, $5.2 billion in the committee bill is in the form of outright grants.

Compare this extravagance with the administration's bills which would total only $1.65 billion and of this amount, $200 million would be in the form of loans.

Secondly, both the Senate and the House bills will be a strong wind which will excite raging fires of inflation. Of course, some Democrats assert that the House committee bill will have little immediate impact on the budget. They boast that considerable time would elapse before these vast expenditures. This type of logic is just another illustration of my original premise. The Democrats do not care how great is the national indebtedness, so long as they can foist it off on the next generation.

A major part of our this year's $12 billion deficit is the mushrooming growth of the Federal aid projects voted in 1955, 1956, and 1957, and prior thereto. Little inflation from those measures was felt in years they were voted.

But not only will the next generation pay—this one will, too.

In the excellent minority report on S. 57, there is a discussion of 11 provisions of this bill which will accelerate expenditures within available authorizations. Not one of these provisions is found within the sound and responsible administration bill.

While the committee is proposing a measure far more inflationary than even their bill last year, which failed to pass, the entire Nation is becoming more conscious than ever of the danger of fiscal extravagance. I want to enter into the RECORD at this point tabulations comparing last year's and this year's Democratic bill. This table makes it readily apparent that the Democrats are ignoring the Soviet strategy to bankrupt America. The table is documentary evidence that the Democrats are glossing over the dangers in inflation which cripple the income of the aged and the retired.

[6] Separate bill has already passed the House, this Congress, providing $300,000,000 for these loans.

Thirdly, by the decrease in FHA downpayments and by requiring FNMA to purchase mortgages at par, and thus pay more than the market price, the Democrat Senate and House bills would further promote inflation. This special-assistance fund of FNMA is a direct backdoor drain on the Treasury.

Both the Senate and House bills are a further step toward subversion of the traditional American system by substituting statism for private activities. By the FNMA par purchase requirement, it would generally be impossible for private investors to purchase these mortgages, since par would be in excess of the market price. By maintaining artificially low interest rates on Government housing loans, private investment would be further driven from the field. By the Senate bill eliminating existing provisions of law designed to prevent competition between public and private housing, and subject income limits for public housing to almost unrestricted local political pressures, private housing will almost be excluded from the middle-income brackets.

Fourthly, the Senate and House proposals represent a further attempt toward centralization. This comes at a time when the administration is seeking to share financial responsibility with the States and localities.

There is an alarming contrast between the approach of the House bill and that of the administration bill.

In the past urban renewal projects have been predominantly residential. The House bill would increase capital grants for nonresidential projects. The administration proposes a sound loan program, instead of a Federal giveaway program, so that private enterprise on a local level will be advanced rather than be retarded.

The Senate bill, of course, would sabotage local responsibility even more than the House bill. The provision for 5-year retroactive credit for local improvements would greatly reduce or eliminate cash contributions by many communities. Lack of responsibility in the Senate bill is also characterized by the attempt to put the Federal Government into speculative land purchases for urban renewal. Federal loans for acquisition of urban renewal project land would be authorized even before a project has been firmly approved or a sound plan agreed upon. The Federal Government, then, would become like the wild speculators in Florida during the roaring twenties. They got rich quickly or else went broke.

Both the Senate and House committee bills obviously were written in a rushed manner with no real concern for the future. The individual homeowner would suffer. For example, the Senate bill would sell public housing units to over-income tenants. The unsafe sales formula is such that the equity accumulated by purchaser of the housing unit would be comparatively worthless. In a typical case, the purchaser would have equity of only $750 after making payments for 10 years. This would hardly cover depreciation.

The Democrat housing bills typify an approach that ignores the Soviet challenge which must be met by a sound economy, and that lacks consideration for generations of Americans who will come after us. The Democrat-controlled 85th Congress created a record of irresponsibly spending the taxpayers money that shocked America. The Democrat proposals in the 85th Congress, if all passed, would have amounted to over $200 billion over the next 5 years.

By 1959 the spending tag had been firmly pinned on the Democrat donkey. Suddenly the pressure of irate constituents became so great that panicky Democrats began to shout that the Republicans were the spenders. They chattered about what amounts to Republican "front-door" spending through the Appropriations Committee, and ignored their own deceptive "back-door" spending. Through the rear entrance to the Treasury vast obligations were built up for the Government that never went through the Appropriations Committee. The Democrats thought they were fooling the Nation.

Plainly, the Democrat housing bill is another attempt not only to bust the President's budget, but to bust the budgets of our children.

We need good housing legislation. The funds which authorized FHA home mortgage insurance program, slum clearance, and college housing are almost exhausted. Administration Representatives, on the first day of this session of Congress, proposed in House Joint Resolution 89—MCDONOUGH, WIDNALL, and BETTS—remedial action, but the Democrats denied the real needs of the country in their attempts to put through Congress an extravagant omnibus housing bill. They needed these three urgency arguments to force this great omnibus housing bill through Congress. Their present bills of the Senate and the House committees represent dangerous proposals and display a gross lack of responsibility toward the long range welfare of our Nation. These bills approach the problems of housing in ways harmful to private enterprise and local government. They apply a philosophy which is alien to the greatest traditions of the American way of life.

We do not have to vote this housing hodgepodge monstrosity. The administration bill is a sound practical approach, and it provides all the legislation needed by the Nation at this time. It is a positive program.

If the Members of this body vote for the Democrat housing bills, they are voting for a luxurious extravaganza their children will some day condemn. When the Members of this body vote for the administration bill, they are voting for a continuance of the principles that have made America the greatest Nation in the history of the world.

Mr. CEDERBERG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HIESTAND. Glad to yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CEDERBERG.]

Mr. CEDERBERG. I agree with all the sentiments expressed in the gentleman's fine explanation of the fiscal problems which will arise if the Democratic proposed housing bill is enacted. It seems to me if there ever was a time when we should get our fiscal house in order, it is now. I say to the gentleman he has made a very valuable contribution in pointing out the differences that exist between the administration's proposal and the Democratic proposal which will probably be up for consideration by the membership of this body in the very near future.

I intend to support the administration proposal because I believe it is a proposal that will be in the long-term best interests of the citizens of this country. It strikes me very forcibly when I find that our Democratic friends have no consideration whatsoever about the future generations of this country. Here we are faced with a deficit of something over $280 billion, yet spending proposals come into this body year after year.

Of course, I believe there is a little politics in some of these spending proposals because the most shocked people in the entire country would be some of those who vote for all these proposals, when they wake up to the realization of what they will be faced with in reality. I think it is slightly dishonest to propose these grandiose spending bills whether they be for housing or other public works unless they have the intestinal fortitude to provide the revenue to foot the bill.

We have mortgaged the earnings of the future generations of this country by far too much already.

I intend to stick with the position of the Republican members of the Banking and Currency Committee on this housing legislation because I think they are absolutely right and that that they will not be inflationary.

Mr. HIESTAND. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. It's excellent.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HIESTAND. I yield to my distinguished colleague from California.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. I, too, wish to compliment the gentleman from California on his splendid and clear statement in which he so well points out some of the things inherent in one of the pending housing bills. I hope all Members of Congress will take the trouble to read and study these remarks, because they are very much worth while.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HIESTAND. I yield to my able colleague from Arizona.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. I want to compliment the gentleman on his very fine statement concerning this housing bill which is pending and which will probably be on the floor before too many days have elapsed.

Does the gentleman recall that last week, I think it was, the Democratic Advisory Council in a statement suggested that the economy should be propped, that there should be some sort of props put under the economy. Such a statement coming from the floor as it did struck me as rather strange, since it seems to be pretty well understood that this year coming up will be the second most prosperous year in the history of the Republic, if not the most prosperous. I wonder if the gentleman from California has any ideas as to what the Advisory Council means when it says that we should prop up the economy in a year such as this?

Mr. HIESTAND. I thank the gentleman from Arizona for his question. I am at a loss to account for such an expression. It would be more like knocking the props out in a prosperous year if we continue along the lines of the committee bill. Certainly there is nothing that I can see on the horizon justifying such a statement.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HIESTAND. I yield.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. I wonder if the gentleman might agree with me that this particular proposal, the housing bill is another example of what I have called the worm's-eye view of the economy, as proposed by gentlemen from the other side of the aisle? In other words, they are so intent on looking at the little hills and valleys immediately ahead that they loom large and out of proportion and they lose the true perspective of the whole countryside and what really lies in the future.

It is like a worm going over the terrain. If you are a worm, those hills look pretty big; however, if you get up and above them and are able to look at the whole thing, you probably are able to chart a better course because you are not worried about a few little things which in the long run are not going to turn out to mean much.

I cannot help but remark also concerning the so-called unemployed march on Washington last week. Certainly nobody wants to belittle anyone who is unemployed or to do anything but feel a great sense of loss at the plight in which some of these people find themselves.

The official statistics released last week by the Department of Commerce and the Department of Labor, showing the greatest increase in employment in 8 years, apparently caught the prophets of economic gloom in this country by surprise.

Unfortunately, one person caught off base was George Meany, President of AFL–CIO. Mr. Meany had not previously been a member of the gloom and doom team. However he was forced into a most embarrassing role by an action of the AFL–CIO which he personally opposed. This action was dictated by Walter Reuther against the better judgment of Mr. Meany and many more responsible leaders of the AFL–CIO.

This action was the so-called unemployment march on Washington. It was designed by Mr. Reuther to create an impression at home and abroad that our American economy was in precarious position and that unemployment was continuing to rise. It is my feeling also, Mr. Speaker, that it was a cheap attempt to exploit the misery of those Americans who are unemployed, for the political gain of Walter Reuther and the furtherance of his schemes to spend our economy into another ruinous cycle of inflation.

Mr. Meany after it was too late, apparently saw that the unemployed would reach Washington at about the time that the most spectacular rise of employment since 1951 had been announced. Therefore being a good soldier, Mr. Meany tried to save the situation by issuing the following statement:

> During the period from February to March, there is a normal seasonal improvement in the unemployment figures of approximately 5 percent. That would mean that, if the normal seasonal improvement is reflected in the March figures, unemployment would be down approximately 250,000 to 300,000.
> Even a substantial drop, far in excess of that figure, would still leave us with a serious unemployment problem. If the figure were in the 250,000 to 300,000 range, it would mean merely seasonal improvement and no change in the overall unemployment situation. On the other hand, if the improvement figure were less than 250,000, it would mean the unemployment situation had worsened.

Actually, the increase in jobs during March was 1,106,000 and the decrease in unemployment was 387,000. This was the greatest jump in employment since 1951, and the greatest decline in unemployment since 1950.

The unemployment march, of course, had fallen flat. Its preparation had been accompanied by numerous difficulties local unions had in finding unemployed members to attend. I am not minimizing, Mr. Speaker, the actual plight of those Americans who remain unemployed, but I think we all deplore such attempts to exploit their situation for purposes of political or personal ambition.

I am sorry that Mr. Meany found himself in this position, through no fault of his own. I am even more sorry that he went so far to justify an ill advised position of his organization as to make the following statement:

The drop in unemployment was mostly seasonal. There is no appreciable improvement in the overall picture. Certainly well-staged propaganda announcements will not solve the problem.

Mr. Meany knows the regular monthly releases of unemployment figures are not propaganda announcements, but are based on the best information available by the Department of Labor.

I prefer to believe that Mr. Meany's true feelings about our economy were expressed in the AFL–CIO News in January of this year in his forthright answers to an article in Trud, the official Soviet organ for trade unionists:

Trud refuses to admit that economic recovery has been quite rapid and that the recession in the United States is almost over. Personal income has reached a new high of $360 billion per year in November 1958. This is an increase of $14 billion over the previous high in August 1957. Industrial production has recovered about two-thirds of the drop experienced during the recession. Productivity is now increasing at a rapid rate—perhaps as much as 6 percent a year.

Our trade unions have continued to obtain substantial wage advances, while prices have remained relatively stable. For the first half of 1958, almost 55 percent of the wage adjustments provided an increase of 10 cents or more. More than one-fourth of the hourly wage increases were 13 cents or more. Real wages are showing very significant increases. This means a continuously rising American standard of living.

It is most unfortunate that Mr. Meany's association with the politically ambitious Mr. Reuther has put him in the position of talking out of both sides of his mouth. This is not characteristic of the always forthright George Meany. It is my hope that this apparent change in image will not be a permanent one.

I wish to thank the gentleman from California again for his very fine statement.

Mr. HIESTAND. I rather imagine that the gentleman from Arizona will agree with me, in view of Mr. Meany's mistake, that the most untenable position of all is trying to defend a mistake, will he not?

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. I think that is the point I tried to make. We here see a man who, I think, got himself in a position he did not want to get into. It was against his better judgment. But, like the good soldier that he is, he tried to do the best he could, but he got himself into an untenable position. And I have a great amount of respect for Mr. Meany.

Mr. HIESTAND. I thank the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HIESTAND. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I wonder, if in putting the facts together or the statement together that the gentleman just made, in what I think is rather a partisan manner, he had considered a few points of interest. One is this: I happen to be of a generation that was permitted, and was proud to do so, to serve some time in the service in the early forties. During that period of time our generation, which is the succeeding generation now—and you are talking about another one—is the generation that made no profit out of the war, but the generation that made the profit out of the war is largely represented by you gentlemen who are now complaining because we cannot have investments in public buildings, and those are the gentlemen who profiteered at the expense of the bondholders or the people who invested in bonds $200 billion in extent. We went into debt $200 billion, and now we are paying the interest on that $200 billion that your generation profited from, and as the result of this and as the result of the increase in the interest rate, due to the fact that the administration has failed to support the bond market, we have this tremendous debt. Now, the result is because your generation profited to the extent of $200 billion in bonds, and you are now increasing the interest rate down here to an extent of several billion dollars a year, we have less money with which to invest in school buildings, for example, so that this generation that fought the war can have no place to send their children to school.

Mr. HIESTAND. I wish the gentleman could suggest some method to sell bonds at a price less than is being paid.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am surprised there is a question along that line, after the last 3 or 4 years. When the Government supported the bond market there was no trouble getting rid of the bonds and the people were willing to invest at a lower interest rate, but just as soon as you failed to support the bond market they refused to buy them at that interest rate, because they are pretty largely going down.

Mr. HIESTAND. The support of the bond market was the most inflationary measure that this country ever adopted and is in large measure responsible for the falling value of the dollar and the increased cost of living.

Mr. CEDERBERG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HIESTAND. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CEDERBERG. I am always interested in these experts on bonds and the management of the national debt. The same people who are such experts on bonds and the same people who are such experts in the management of the national debt and so forth are the very same people that put us into this mess of two hundred and eighty-some billion dollars as far as deficit is concerned. Now, if your party had as much concern in previous years, as far as spending is concerned, as you are in giving advice as to how to manage the debt, we would not be in this predicament.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. All you have to know is to know how to read to be able to see the statistics which are very much available on these bonds. When the Government bond market was supported we had lower interest rates than we have now. The interest rate has almost doubled as a result of the Government's failure to support them.

Mr. CEDERBERG. All the gentleman has to do is to remember that the national debt is something like $280 billion, and if his side of the aisle will do as much as this side of the aisle is doing in an effort to keep the budget balanced and spending down, we will not be faced with these problems in future years.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It was $280 billion when the interest rate was lower, too.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HIESTAND. I yield to the senior ranking member on the Housing Subcommittee, my very able colleague from California [Mr. McDONOUGH].

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the statement that my colleague from California has been making on this very crucial problem of debt management, debt obligation, the fiscal policy of the country, and the omnibus housing bill that will soon be coming up for action.

While we are talking about the public debt and its monumental size of $288 billion, we seem to forget that in 1937 we passed the original Housing Act which provided that all of the bonds subscribed for the building of public housing units in this country—and there have been some 444,000 of them built at a cost of $3,331 million—all the bonds for those public housing units are tax-exempt; that is, the interest on them is tax-exempt. The little taxpayer who buys a savings bond has to pay a tax on the interest that he receives from that bond. But the big bond houses and the wealthy people who in many instances bought these public housing bonds get them tax-exempt.

An attempt was made in the original act to make it appear as if public housing bonds were a municipal responsibility, and an obligation against the credit of the city or the county or the State in which they were sold. This is not true. Public housing bonds that are sold in any city or county in the United States are not part of the debt obligation of that city or county, and therefore they are not in the same category as a municipal bond issued for the building of a sewage-disposal plant or a highway or public building. But this was an attempt to sugar up, to entice the public to buy public housing bonds. So, the interest on them was made tax-exempt. So, the small taxpayer is paying that additional tax, while the large bondholders are exempt. And, in addition, there is a $222 million subsidy to maintain these bonds, to make them tax-exempt.

Mr. HIESTAND. That is, per year?

Mr. McDONOUGH. Yes.

Mr. HIESTAND. I thank the gentleman for his statement. His contribution is very pertinent and valuable.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HIESTAND. I'm happy to yield to the very able gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, I merely wanted to tell my colleague that he has been of great help to me in the past on the matter of housing and other matters that come before his committee. I want him to know that those of us who are sitting in committee now, while this House is in session, would be here if it were not for the other responsibilities which they have to take care of in the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that I have admired his work in the past as he has striven to maintain fiscal responsibility in the Housing bill. I am particularly concerned, in addition to what the gentleman from California [Mr. McDONOUGH], has said about tax-exempt public housing bonds, about the public housing provisions contained in the two bills, and I should like to ask the gentleman a question for the purpose of clarification about the Republican and the Democrat bills. I understand they are now before the Committee on Rules and will be coming up in the House very soon. Is it not true that there are many thousands of units included in the Democrat bill, but in the Republican bill there are no new public housing units? Is that correct?

Mr. HIESTAND. That is correct.

Mr. ALGER. Can the gentleman give me the figures contained in the Democrat bill for this year?

Mr. HIESTAND. The Democrat bill does not mention dollars, but it includes making available 190,000 new public housing units in addition to those that are now in. If we extend the amount of subsidy per unit per month for the 40 years the bonds will have to be subsidized, the cost to the taxpayers would amount to some $3,800 million.

Mr. ALGER. This is not to say, then, that we do not believe in housing, as far as taking care of the basic wants of those who need housing, but there is a difference, a conflict in viewpoint, between the two groups as to the best way of getting housing for the people that need housing. Is that not correct?

Mr. HIESTAND. That is correct.

Mr. ALGER. Public housing is not necessarily the way to do it. There are other means for getting good low-cost housing for people without burdening the Federal taxpayer more at the present time.

Mr. HIESTAND. As a matter of fact, the present laws are working pretty well. They are spreading housing very rapidly and at low cost.

Mr. ALGER. Would the gentleman agree that whatever merit there might be to public housing—and this is giving the proponents of public housing the benefit of the doubt, I think the gentleman and I would agree, before we contest the merit of public housing in the first instance—whatever merit there might be is absolutely beyond consideration at this time because of the unbalanced nature of the budget, the $13 billion deficit this year. Many times we have to tighten the belt even on worthy programs if we are going to be fiscally responsible and keep the budget in balance and preserve the integrity of the dollar bill. Does the gentleman agree with that?

Mr. HIESTAND. I do. I might remark to the gentleman that it is certainly a fact, as I have mentioned, that a large part of the deficit of this year is from votes of this House and this Congress in previous years. These laws became effective and the totals are now piling up. That is a major share of the deficit of this year. If we adopt this Democratic bill, the effect on this year's budget will not be heavy, but on future budgets will be very heavy. It will have to be covered by appropriations each year. The present maximum liability per year is $138 million.

Mr. ALGER. That was the point I was making. I want to thank the gentleman for that answer.

Is it not a fact that if we try to be responsible by balancing the budget and protecting the value of the dollar bill, what we are doing is actually preserving the buying power of every dollar bill in the pockets of the workingmen throughout the country?

Mr. HIESTAND. The gentleman is absolutely correct. I agree with him. I thank him for his statement.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HIESTAND. To one of the soundest thinkers in the Congress. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I want to compliment the gentleman on his fine statement of the housing picture and the way he proposes to meet this problem. However, I have been intrigued by again hearing people from the other side of the aisle pay tribute to this will-o'-the-wisp, this idea of getting low interest rates for Federal bonds, as if that can be accomplished without creating economic damage in another way.

What I should like to ask anyone from the other side of the aisle, and I have asked it before on the floor of the House and I have asked it in the Joint Economic Committee, and I might say there are more responsible people—that is my definition of course—on your side who recognize that that is a will-o'-the-wisp—is that those of you who still think you can get low interest rate bonds without economic damage and want to undertake this difficult chore, go back and find out why in 1951. That was a year when the Democratic Party was in control of the Congress and of the executive branch of the Government, we abandoned the program of bolstering the Government bond market and went to the Federal Reserve accord. I think if you will review a little bit of history you will find that it became so apparent to the leaders of your own party that that was an erroneous economic theory that they went to the 1951 Federal Reserve accord, which was to try to have the Federal bonds marketed on the open market so that to some degree, at any rate, the actual cost of money was reflected in the interest rate.

I personally think it is a much healthier situation, although I will say this: I think it is a very proper area for us to undertake to review, to see whether or not we went too far, possibly not far enough, but whether or not the 1951 accord was the best that we could have done. But this fiction of the cost of interest rates on Federal bonds and trying to make a political issue out of it is just nonsense. I think it is about time the people on the Democratic side of the aisle who want to make an issue of it start talking in terms of sense. The best way to start is to review why you abandoned that program in 1951.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. HIESTAND. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HIESTAND. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. McDONOUGH].

Mr. McDONOUGH. This is with reference to the public housing bonds that we were speaking about a moment ago, and the responsibility that the present act places upon the Federal Government to keep them at par, and maintain them at 100-percent value and at the same time give tax exemption on the interest. It seems to me that the responsibility for public housing originating as it does in the community in which the public housing units are built, should be the responsibility of the States, cities, and counties and that they should maintain the parity of the bonds that are sold to build these units. If that were the case there would be local responsibility and the debt of those bonds would be on that city or county and not on the national debt, as it is, on the Federal Government.

Mr. HIESTAND. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

THE WOBURN TIMES, WOPURN, MASS.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, many times since I have been a Member of the House of Representatives, I have spoken here on this floor and elsewhere in public of the very great honor I consider it to have the opportunity to represent the Fifth Congressional District of Massachusetts.

My district in a very large sense is where American freedom was born and where our independence as a nation began.

One of the historic communities in my district is the city of Woburn located 10 miles west by northwest of Boston. Only a few days from now, the people of the city of Woburn will celebrate the 19th of April when the Minute Men of Woburn joined with those of every Middlesex village and farm in the first battle for American liberty. The city of Woburn was first settled around 1638 to 1640, and in 1642 was the first incorporated township set off from Charlestown. The city was named after Woburn in Bedfordshire, England, a town about 50 miles northwest of London.

The city of Woburn received its charter in 1888. It was long noted as the most important leather manufacturing center in New England, and now it has many diversified industries. Among its distinguished citizens have been the ancestors of the four Presidents—Grover Cleveland, Benjamin Harrison, Franklin Pierce, and James Garfield.

Over the last 50 years, one of the institutions for which the people of Woburn are grateful and proud is the city's daily newspaper, the Woburn Daily Times. Without question, the Woburn Daily Times is one of the very finest newspapers in all the world. It certainly ranks among the best in the United States of America. Always constructive, it never has been destructive. The publishers of the Woburn Times through its history always have considered news as information beneficial to mankind. If information had no beneficial qualities it failed to measure up to news.

In these days of rivalry, bitterness, selfishness, and lack of respect for the individual and lack of consideration for the right of privacy, the publishing principles of the Woburn Times are unique and outstanding. This distinguished newspaper seems like a breath of fresh, clean, wholesome air.

Because of the tremendous respect I have had for its publishers over many years, I consider it worthwhile and appropriate to bring to the attention of the American people the outstanding principles which make the Woburn Daily Times an outstanding newspaper. Just as wealth alone does not make any man great, neither does size alone make a newspaper great. Compared with our large metropolitan daily newspapers, the Woburn Times would be considered small. Compared with any newspaper in America on the basis of quality, however, none will rank any higher than the Woburn Times.

The Woburn Daily Times has been the recognized news publication for the city of Woburn, Mass., almost since its inception on the 9th of October of 1901.

It was instituted by the late James D. Haggerty, Sr., on a very modest basis and it has reached its present pinnacle of success through the practice of golden rule journalism. This daily newspaper has placed a ban on news in which scandalous developments flare, and down through its 58 years of existence, it has never scandalized a person or a family, nor has it glorified the developments of the courtroom.

The principle of keeping the news columns of the Times clean of scandal was of primary importance to Mr. James D. Haggerty, the publisher and founder. To his reporters he gave this advice and counsel:

> Never publish a name of a defendant in a court case or names and identities in cases that even border on scandal. Remember, I want the Woburn Daily Times to be a family newspaper and I want it kept so clean that every member of the family can read it without any compunctions. Regardless how criminal a Woburn boy or man or girl, for that matter, develops, just remember that the person came from a family who have earned the right to be free from disgrace. They are entitled to live with their neighbors and their families are entitled to grow up without suffering the burden brought about by the sins of the guilty member of the family.

When a court case of importance becomes a matter of news compulsion, the Woburn Daily Times still refrains from the use of names and calls the criminal or the defendants "a Woburn man" or a "local resident." The person's identity is not made public through the columns of the Times.

The passing of James D. Haggerty, Sr., the founder of the Golden Rule policy, brought his two sons in charge of publishing. They are Paul L. Haggerty, publisher, and James D. Haggerty, Jr., editor in chief.

Under the management of the Haggerty brothers, changes and expansion have been made and perfected. The newspaper has been enlarged and the machinery of operation increased and modernized. They have kept abreast of the times, and, as a matter of fact, from an operational viewpoint have kept ahead of the demands. The circulation has grown until now the newspaper serves the people in many neighboring towns, suburban to Woburn. There is one old-fashioned precept of the Times which has not been abandoned, however, and that is the prohibition against the use of names and the scandalizing of families in court and police news.

The two Haggerty sons of the founder, James D. Haggerty, Sr., have found this doctrine to be a cornerstone on which the reputation of the Times was built and became the family newspaper, and not only that, they too personally believe that the family of the unfortunate should be spared from the spotlight of pitiless publicity.

When the metropolitan dailies give attention to Woburn news events and developments which stigmatize the families of those to be unfortunately involved, the Times continues to adhere rigidly to the founder's original principle: "No names in cases involving scandal."

The Woburn Daily Times is nonpartisan, and in political conflict, opens its columns to both sides of any controversy. Both political parties are invited to submit news items, and both Democratic and Republican leaders on many occasions have acclaimed the eminent fairness of the Woburn Daily Times.

The Times is very proud of its record for Golden Rule journalism. Also, it is proud of the record of never having missed getting an issue published, delivered, and on the street regardless of power failures, storms, and other handicaps. Every patriotic and civic crusade of benefit to the city of Woburn and the Woburn people has had the unlimited support of the Woburn Daily Times.

The people of Woburn and the surrounding communities are proud of their daily newspaper. To them it is a friend that gives them not only the news but valuable information about their community and their day-to-day living. It is a medium upon which the people depend. It is like an old friend to them for it is respected and dependable.

The founder of the Woburn Times, Mr. James D. Haggerty, Sr., and Mrs. Haggerty, the former Mary Lovell, distinguished among the citizenry of Massachusetts, have contributed greatly to their community and their Commonwealth. A lovely and charming lady, today Mrs. Haggerty possesses countless friends, among which I am so proud to say I believe I am included.

Mr. and Mrs. Haggerty were blessed with 11 children, and the Haggerty family circle always has been an active and a happy one. There are two boys and nine daughters, all of whom are married. James is the oldest. The two Haggerty brothers, James and Paul, together with three brothers-in-law, presently operate the Woburn Times organization. The daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Haggerty are Mrs. John E. Gaffney—Mae; Mrs. Dennis Dooley—Madeline; Mrs. John Bundy—Dorothea; Mrs. Nelson Blinn—Arlene; Mrs. Joseph L. McCarthy—Lorraine; Mrs. Elmer Franson—Janice; Mrs. Robert W. Varey—Norma; Mrs. John B. McGowan—Joan; and Mrs. William F. Sullivan—Bernice. There are 37 grandchildren in this wonderful family.

In conclusion, I should like to say that the Woburn Times is a very friendly newspaper, possessed and operated by a very friendly organization. If at any time any Member of the Congress should happen to be passing through Woburn or visiting friends in this friendly city, they are not only welcome, but would find it interesting and pleasant to call in at the Woburn Times. They would be graciously received.

LEST WE FORGET—SOVIET DIPLOMACY

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the 1959 meeting of Foreign Ministers and the proposed summit conference may decide the destiny of world freedom and self-government for generations to come. The cold war conducted by the Kremlin since World War II will meet success or failure at the coming summit meeting. Appeasement and the granting of concessions to the demands of the Communists will shatter hope for millions behind the Iron Curtain and greatly weaken the confidence of neutral nations in free world leadership.

Our State Department and allied representation attending the conference must not forget the history of Soviet international diplomacy over the last 30 years.

The record of Communist leaders as it pertains to violation of international agreements, treaties, and pacts with other nations should be No. 1 on the summit meeting agenda. Our leaders at the proposed summit meeting would commit a gross injustice to millions of enslaved people behind the Iron Curtain if they did not demand a complete review of the treaty and international agreement violations which the Soviets have committed in the last 30 years. The sanctity of international agreements and the wholesale violations of the same must be placed on the coming summit conference agenda.

Representatives to the summit conference from the free world will, by their silence, be accused of endorsing and ratifying the Soviet international treaty violations and aggression crimes by millions of people now under Communist enslavement.

The Congress of the United States in the 82d and 83d Congresses authorized and created two special congressional committees for the purpose of investigating methods and facts pertaining to violations of international agreements and crimes committed by the Soviets in their unlawful aggressions.

The special congressional committee which investigated the Katyn Forest massacre in the 82d session and the Select Committee on Communist Aggression in the 83d Congress collectively heard sworn testimony from over 400 witnesses and recorded hundreds of exhibits revealing the true facts regarding the international record of the Soviet leaders. Dozens of witnesses testified concerning violations of treaties, agreements, pacts, and other Soviet criminal methods to enslave people and nations in their long range program for global conquest. For over 5 years these incriminating hearings, records, and reports on Soviet diplomacy of these two congressional committees totaling nine volumes, have been available to our State Department.

Communist leaders have won the support of millions throughout Asia, Africa, South America, and other areas by spreading false propaganda and lies about capitalism and the free world. Why has our Government neglected or refused to set up an effective international information department and give the true facts about Communist diplomacy to millions throughout the world who have been misled by false Soviet peace propaganda?

Millions throughout the globe believe the Soviet propaganda that the people in satellite countries voluntarily submitted to Kremlin control. Our State Department has been negligent in not utilizing the true facts of Communist aggression as recorded in testimony and reports of two congressional committees in 1952 and in 1954.

These two congressional committees held hearings in America, England, and Europe. Sworn testimony was received from Poles, Hungarians, Bulgarians, Rumanians, Estonians, Latvians, Lithuanians, Ukrainians, Byelorussians, Germans, Czechs, Slovaks, and Russians. The cross section of witnesses included members of former leaders of now captive nations as well as ordinary workers and peasants; internationally known generals, political leaders and soldiers; members of the formerly free parliaments and governments, clergymen of all denominations, heads of great institutions of learning, teachers and students, businessmen, labor leaders, seamen and housewives; intellectuals and even children. They were people who escaped from the Communist-controlled homelands just a few months before our hearings as well as those who escaped during and after World War II. All who testified had one thing in common; they were eyewitnesses. They saw. They experienced. They were there. Most of them suffered the tortures of communism.

A great number of former leaders and officials of captive nations testified that the Soviets succeed in enslaving their countries by violating agreements, promises, and treaties, then through infiltration, intrigue, and subversion which was supported by the Red army and supervised by the Kremlin, took control of their governments.

The Committee on Communist Aggression, after its exhaustive hearings, unanimously adopted 12 separate findings from the evidence. I will read only 3 of the 12 committee findings.

First. Page 24, interim report:

(5) As far as the Communists are concerned, treaties, mutual-assistance pacts, nonaggression pacts, or solemn covenants are mere scraps of paper. Agreements or pledges made at the conference table are broken any time such action serves the Communist table for world conquest.

Second. Page 23, interim report:

(1) Communism never has come to power by legal or by democratic processes in any of the areas now under its ruthless domination. It uses the tactics of penetration, subversion, threat of military invasion, and finally, occupation by military and political elements under the direction and control of the Kremlin.

Third. Page 23, interim report:

(2) Once communism seizes control it immediately seeks to clothe itself with respectability and legality by conducting so-called elections which are in no sense of the word free elections guaranteed by the secret ballot. Moreover, the results are predetermined long in advance of the first vote cast.

I again repeat that the testimony and reports, in full, of these two above-mentioned select congressional committees are available to our State Department and are of immense value to our representatives at the coming Ministers and summit conference. The disgraceful record of the Communist leaders in the past for maliciously violating international treaties, agreements, and pacts must be placed on the coming summit meeting agenda.

I am hereby submitting excerpts from the testimony of but a few of the witnesses who testified before our two select committees in the 82d and 83d Congress concerning the stability and value of Soviet international agreements, pacts, and treaties.

I am submitting to the House Foreign Affairs Committee and also our State Department these recommendations with the hope that the coming Foreign Ministers' meeting take necessary action in an effort to remind and inform millions in the free world and neutral nations the true facts involving Moscow and its false propaganda concerning treaties and agreements for world peace.

The following are excerpts from the testimony before the Select Committee on Communist Aggression.

Herbert Hoover, ex-President of the United States, volume 2, pages 221–222:

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER. I had to deal with the Communist movement beginning in 1918. I was delegated by the allied governments to look after 12 Communist revolutions in Western Europe. I naturally was interested in the Communist movement per se. From that time on I became quite an earnest student of the whole of Communist literature and Communist processes as applied to international life. No one can read the speeches of Lenin and Stalin and Molotov and ever believe that agreement with Russia has more than temporary value. There are occasions when I think agreements could be made which would be to their interest or to the mutual interest, but those are pretty rare occasions. Such agreements would last only just so long as it suited the Russians. You have to bear in mind that during the interval between the First World War and the Second World War it suited the Russians to have a peaceful front. During that time, they made 36 different nonaggression pacts or treaties guaranteeing nonaggression activities. Every one of those went by the board the day they made the agreement with Hitler in 1939. That ought to indicate the sacredness of an agreement in the mind of a Russian when it doesn't suit him.

Hon. Juozas Kajeckas, counselor of the Lithuanian Legation, volume 2, page 8:

Honorable KAJECKAS. In a speech delivered at the 18th Congress of the Communist Party, Stalin stated that under the existing political circumstances the time was ripe "for reappraisal of existing international pledges and agreements." That same year a map appeared, published by the Russian general staff, showing Lithuanian territory as a component part of the territory of the Soviet Union. In addition to its military significance, this map shows that the attack on Lithuania by the Soviet Union was premediated.

Dr. Anatol Dinbergs, Charge D'Affaires, Latvian Legation, volume 2, pages 35–36:

Doctor DINBERGS. The carrying into effect of the present pact must in no way affect the sovereign rights of the contracting parties, in particular their structure, their economic and social system, and their military measures.

By signing the above agreement in good faith, even though under duress, Latvia had underwritten the door of her liberty, unaware of the fact at that time that the fate of the Baltic Republics had already been sealed in the Stalin-Hitler agreement of friendship and nonaggression of August 23, 1939.

Hon. Johannes Kaiv, Acting Consul General in Charge of the Legation at Estonia, volume 2, pages 35–36:

Congressman MACHROWICZ. Do you feel there is any freedom or chance for freedom of your people through negotiations with Soviet Russia?

Mr. KAIV. It is difficult to reply, but it depends upon what is in the negotiations. When you negotiate a treaty with them, according to Estonia, there is no reason—I myself don't know of any international agreement to which Soviet Russia is a party, which they have not violated.

Gen. T. Bor-Komorowski, of Poland, page 1126, volume 3:

Congressman MADDEN. Now, General, one final question: With all your experience as a soldier and statesman, and dealings with the Communist do you think that these meetings and conferences that are being held at Geneva, Panmunjom and Korea, do you think that the free nations are ever going to make any progress or gain anything by conferences with the Communists?

General BOR-KOMOROWSKI. I do not think the free nations will come to any real conclusion with the Communists through conferences. The Soviet aim is to conquer the world. They need conferences only in order to have time for their underground and fifth column preparation to undermine the world.

Congressman MADDEN. In other words, their conferences are part of the strategy to get more time in order to carry out their program to conquer the world.

General BOR-KOMOROWSKI. Yes.

Gen. Wladyslaw Anders, of Poland, pages 1180, 1186, 1189, volume 3:

General ANDERS. I understand, but I must explain that I am not a politician. I am a soldier. From my long experience as a soldier I know that when an army attacks everything depends on the leaders. If the leaders advance well in front of a company, all the men will follow them, but if the leaders stop and waver the whole company is sunk. The situation today is similar. If the United States leads with determination and strength, all other people will go with them. But if the United States were to stop at words without facts and action to confirm them, such weakness would spread to other people. But I think the U.S. military leaders do not realize that today the leadership is theirs. It is necessary to understand that today it is the United States that leads the free world against its greatest enemy—Soviet Russia.

General ANDERS. Yes; that is right. Molotov said that it was very fortunate. You must remember that Poland had a nonaggression pact with Russia at the time, which Russia broke on the 17th of September 1939 by invading Poland. But I ask you what agreement has not been broken by Russia? Only one, that was with Hitler from 1939 to 1941, because Hitler was strong.

* * * * *

General ANDERS. I think you are absolutely right. Conferences are regarded necessary by the Bolsheviks only for two reasons: One is to spread their propaganda across the world, the other to gain time. Ever since Lenin and Stalin, the Bolsheviks have said the same thing: Their aim is to dominate the world. If necessary, they will use blackmail. If necessary, they will momentarily retreat—if such is the decision of the Communist heirarchy, they will go ahead again with double force.

Mr. Charles Rozmarek, president, Polish National Alliance and Polish American Congress, page 703, volume 3:

Mr. ROZMAREK. I think history has demonstrated since 1939 that you cannot do business with Soviet Russia, and in view of the fact that you cannot do business with them as a civilized nation, I think it certainly is time to put them outside the pale of the families of civilized nations.

Joseph Lipski, former Polish Ambassador to Germany, page 802, volume 3:

Congressman HILLINGS. Then would you say this is correct that every effort that has been made in the past to work out some sort of peaceful coexistence with the Soviet has not been successful?

Mr. LIPSKI. Yes; I am quite definite on that because I firmly believe that guiding principles of a moral nature are decisive principles in the international life of nations. If these principles are lacking, my experience has shown me that there are no good results with all these agreements if they are not based on international ethics and morals. The same happened with Hitler. I had quite a good insight for 6 years, being Ambassador in Berlin and I followed up the whole thing. I am speaking here as somebody who worked on these matters very thoroughly.

Ambassador Waclaw Grzybowski, Polish diplomat, scientist, and farmer, Ambassador to Moscow, page 960, volume 3:

Congressman FEIGHAN. Mr. Ambassador, when were you first aware of the contents of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact?

Ambassador GRZYBOWSKI. There was two, there was one official, and they signed on August 23, which was normal pact of nonaggression and of consultation. It was a normal pact of nonaggression and of consultation. It was only one more example of the duplicity of the Soviet Government which negotiated with Great Britain and France a pact of mutual assistance and at the same time negotiated a quite opposed pact of not mutual assistance but nonaggression and consultation with Germany.

Ambassador Edward Raczynski, of Poland, page 973, volume 3:

Ambassador RACZYNSKI. I think that negotiations with the Kremlin are only possible if your strength and your position are such that you can impose conditions which they will be forced to execute or to fulfill. But if you put trust in their word and expect them to fulfill it for fulfillment's sake, you are certain to be disappointed.

Ex-King Michael of Rumania, page 1009, volume 3:

Committee Counsel MCTIGUE. Is it not true, Your Majesty, that during the course of your discussions with Vishinsky you referred to the Yalta agreement which had just been consummated.

King MICHAEL. That was in his violent audience. In my reply, I said, "I am doing things in our manner and according to the interests of my country, and besides, the conference at Yalta says that every country is free to choose its own form of government." Whereupon he said, "In this case I am Yalta and I tell you what to do."

Alfreds Berzins, Latvian Minister of Public Affairs, 1934 to 1940, and Congressman Bonin, page 178, volume 2:

Congressman BONIN. It is apparent from your official capacity, and from the facts that you experienced, the Russian Government violated every agreement that they had with your country; is that right?

Mr. BERZINS. That is correct. Well remember that once in the League of Nations Litvinoff said that each agreement is only a piece of paper. And for the Soviet Union, each agreement is only a piece of paper.

Voldemar G. Ludig, U.S. member of the board of the Estonian National Committee of New York, page 145, volume 2:

Congressman KERSTEN. Mr. Ludig, would you place any reliance on the word of a Communist from your experiences with them?

Mr. LUDIG. No, sir; I wouldn't believe a Communist. You read in the papers about some conference that is going to take place again. May I ask you, what kind of a conference or what kind of agreements have the Russians kept in the past? To the best of my knowledge, they didn't keep a single one.

Mihail Farcasanu, president, League of Free Rumanians, former editor and publisher of the Rumanian paper Viitorul, pages 77, 78, volume 4:

Mr. FARCASANU. I consider that in view of the situation, after 10 years of experience with the Red government of Rumania, their infringements of every international agreement, infringements coming also from all the satellite puppet governments, which were installed by Moscow in the countries behind the Iron Curtain, to make trade with those governments means to help consolidate their tyranny, to condone their crime, one of the greatest crimes ever perpetrated upon formerly free people.

In the records of the committee hearings in Washington, D.C., on December 2, 1954, can be found interesting statements and ideas concerning coexistence in Rumania.

Peaceful coexistence meant for Rumania the destruction of the country as a free and independent nation. Peaceful coexistence meant the murder of the innocent, the criminal persecution of the church and of the clergy, the destruction of free thought, the destruction of free economy, the destruction of family, and the national destruction through deportations. These things are still going on today.

Coexistence with the Communists means without question and in every case, the destruction of those who want to peacefully coexist. Coexistence, peaceful coexistence, means at the same time helping in the preparation of a major war at the most favorable moment for the Communists. Coexistence means a spell of tranquillity for the Communist world, during which they will endeavor to destroy your free economy, through economic treacherous means, to destroy the morale of the free countries and to prepare militarily for a showdown with you; for your destruction is their ultimate objective.

Interim report on Communist aggression, page 22:

If the free world were to accept such a policy, it could only be based on the vain hope that, given time, the leaders of the Communist regime and the Communist tenets of government would gradually lose their aggressive and inimical attitude toward the West—that the U.S.S.R. would eventually become a peaceful member of the society of nations. But all the evidence heard before our committee conclusively proves that the Communists want time—not to become civilized—but to digest their gains and to mold their millions of captive peoples into willing slaves of greater aggressions.

The testimony of Dr. Jaroslav Stransky, Minister of Justice in Czechoslovakia has particular significance on the proposition of coexistence. He was a Socialist, and like most Socialists, sought to cooperate with the Communists:

Congressman KERSTEN. Just one final point. Do you think that the history of Czechoslovakia proves beyond any shadow of a doubt that there is no such thing as a peaceful coexistence between the free world and communism?

Dr. STRANSKY. That is right, and we only fear that the other world will not realize it. This was the fruit of our example.

Congressman KERSTEN. It meant the downfall of Czechoslovakia to try in every way to get along with the Communists; did it not?

Dr. STRANSKY. Yes.

The history of Czechoslovakia is the history of every government that tried to coexist, or cooperate, with the Communists.

Msgr. Bela Varga, president, Hungarian National Council, pages 12–13, volume 4:

Msgr. BELA VARGA. I had my first personal encounter with communism in 1919. At Csorna, Hungary, the village next to ours, the best citizens were being hanged on the trees around the church. The memory of these events accompanied me throughout my life, a life dedicated to the fight against communism. In later years, 1945, 1946, 1947, I again came into contact with communism and found it the greatest threat to human liberty, dignity, and love. Now that I have had to leave my own country and live in exile, I can only urge every free nation and every free man to unite against this greatest, most brutal foe of mankind: godless communism that has set out to conquer the entire free world. On this solemn occasion let me quote the words of Abraham Lincoln, your great American President, who said, "You cannot escape the responsibility of tomorrow by evading it today." Gentlemen of the committee, through you I am relaying to the American Congress and to the whole free world the anguished cries of a nation sentenced to slow death by the crushing power of Soviet imperialism to which I add my humble but urgent plea for help for final liberation."

Mr. NAGY. Yes, Congressman; I am speaking of the mistake, first of all, of the Asiatic peoples. They are mistaken when they believe communism will liberate those who are still under colonialism, will bring social justice among them, will raise and increase their living standards. I am speaking about them. I think it is our duty to fight communism, not only in the field of diplomacy and not only in the field of armaments but in the field of people, the working people. We have to convince those underdeveloped nations that all their desires, national and personal desires, may be fulfilled only by democracy, and first of all, by the American sort of democracy.

THE COMMUNIST SEIZURE OF HUNGARY

Soviet Russia could have imposed a Communist dictatorship on powerless Hungary shortly after the occupation of the country by the Red army. This was probably not deemed opportune because of the various interallied agreements and the internal situation in Hungary, where the Communist Party had no popular support. Instead of attempting to introduce the Soviet system in one sweeping move, the Kremlin decided to follow a more cautious policy. There moved with the Soviet Army into devastated Hungary, a group of Hungarian emigrees, members of the 1919 Communist regime of Bela Kun—the so-called Muscovites—the number of whom was estimated at 160. At the hearings of the Subcommittee on Hungary held in New York on August 23, 1954, special reference was made to the persons and activities of the Muscovites by Monsignor Varga, former President of the Hungarian Parliament:

Congressman BENTLEY. You said when the Russians came into Hungary they brought about 160 Communists with them. Were they Russians or Hungarians?

Msgr. VARGA. They were of Hungarian origin, but they had become Russian citizens. All of them had Russian citizenship.

Congressman BENTLEY. They came in and they organized the Hungarian Communist Party and, as you say, they actually began the Hungarian Communist Party out of what had been the Hungarian Nazi Party.

Msgr. VARGA. Yes; that is correct.

These Muscovites were entrusted to apply the Communist recipe for conquest. Some of them had played an important role in the international Communist movement and had fulfilled missions as Communist organizers in various foreign countries. Their only loyalty had been absolute obedience to the Kremlin.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include certain excerpts from the testimony of witnesses who appeared before the committees mentioned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield.

Mr. MACHROWICZ. I want to thank the gentleman very warmly for his valuable contribution to a situation which is so very important to us at this time; and I want to say, having been a member of both these committees and knowing General Komoroski, that his assistance contributed greatly to the successful operation of those two committees. I remember also that at one time our chief delegate to the United Nations told me that the findings of this committee had been extremely valuable and helpful to him in presenting the situations at various times at the United Nations.

I think it would be extremely valuable for those contemplating attending or participating in the forthcoming conferences dealing with Berlin to study seriously the findings of these committees, for from them they will find how the Communists have violated all their agreements. I think it is a cardinal precept of diplomacy that they should go to the meeting armed with all the facts available to them.

Again I want to compliment the gentleman and thank him for taking the time to bring this to our attention today.

Mr. MADDEN. I thank the gentleman. I might say that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACHROWICZ], was a member of the committee that investigated the Katyn Forest massacres and also a member of the committee in the 84th Congress that investigated Communist aggression at hearings in this country and Europe. The gentleman's services were very valuable especially during the Katyn hearings concerning the massacre of over 14,000 Polish leaders. Poland, a country of which he has great knowledge, is his former homeland. His ability to speak several languages was a great help to both committees.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD], now on the floor, was also a member of the Katyn investigating committee and contributed greatly to the work of the committee in recording the evidence which was submitted. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROMAN PUCINSKI], a new Member, served as special investigator on the Katyn Forest massacres investigation and also contributed greatly to the work of that committee.

The other member of the Katyn committee now serving in Congress was ALVIN O'KONSKI who contributed greatly to the success of the hearings.

In the 83d Congress, MICHAEL FEIGHAN, of Ohio, and ALVIN BENTLEY, of Michigan, also THOMAS DODD, of Connecticut, now serving in the other body contributed greatly of their services on the select committee which investigated Communist aggression.

RUSSIA AND THE AMERICAN NEGRO

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FORRESTER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FORRESTER. Mr. Speaker, a U.P. story by Louis Cassels bylined from Washington and appearing in the Albany Herald of April 7, 1959, tells of the reaction of the Communist press to an article appearing in the latest issue of America Illustrated.

America Illustrated is a Russian language magazine, distributed in the Soviet Union by the U.S. Information Service at taxpayers' expense.

The article in America Illustrated told of the "dramatic progress" Negroes in the United States have made in recent years in income, education, and housing. For instance:

The average dollar income of Negro workers has gone up 415 percent since 1940, while the average income of white workers has risen 277 percent.

Also, America Illustrated showed pictures of "mixed Negro and white groups at work in offices and scientific laboratories, worshipping in church, playing basketball, attending school, and participating as equals in civic meetings."

Mr. Cassels says that the Soviet newspapers charge that America Illustrated has juggled figures and hidden facts and, charged that there were "Negro ghettos" in New York, Washington, and Chicago, and that discrimination is being practiced in those cities.

It is completely disgusting to know that the U.S. Government is spending taxpayers' money in any such manner. Anyone spending taxpayers' money for such things does not have enough sense to get out of a shower of rain. The people that I represent are sick, tired, and disgusted over their tax money being spent in any such way, and they think it is high time that the United States quit kow-towing to Russia.

Russia well knows that America has gone crazy over the Negro issue just as Russia wanted the United States to do. Russia well knows that the income of Negro workers has gone up 415 percent since 1940, while the average income of white workers has risen only 277 percent. I am satisfied, however, that Russia does not understand how the income of the Negro has increased so much more than the income of the white people. As a matter of fact, I feel certain that Russia does not understand just how it is that 25 percent of the workers in Government are Negroes, although the Negro population is about 15 percent.

I am certain that Russia does know that she has already sold many in this country her foolish and false theory of the brotherhood of man, a theory completely at variance with the Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish religions. Russia knows that she has made us look ridiculous, and that if she will continue to agitate some people in this country will turn somersaults in an effort to do things far more foolish and more ridiculous.

The story by Louis Cassels is proof positive that our United States propaganda analysts are doing us far more harm than good. America Illustrated is a magazine that the United States Government should close out. It is one that never should have been brought into being.

TENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE TONEMASTER MANUFACTURING CO., OF PEORIA, ILL.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, Members of this House are becoming accustomed, I believe, to my singing the praises of my home town, for we have so many institutions which make us proud that we hail from Peoria, Ill. Peoria's products, ranging from tractors and heavy earth-moving machinery to the finest distilled spirits, are known the world over, and in between these two extremes we have many smaller industries, many of which are dominant in their field. One of these, Tonemaster Manufacturing Co., is one of our fastest growing industries, celebrating its 10th anniversary in Peoria.

The history and growth of this company, now celebrating its 13th year in business, represents, and indelibly reiterates, the basic principles upon which our country has been founded that an economy built upon private enterprise provides the greatest opportunity for the enterprising individual to rise just as high as his talents, inventiveness, and willingness to work will take him.

Paul B. H. Smith, of Peoria, president of Tonemaster, long ago realized that people with hearing deficiencies belong usually to one of two classes: Either they are totally unaware of being hard-of-hearing or, knowing this, they are supersensitive in this respect, believing that they will be considered apart from others and thus limit their social and professional opportunities.

Some 15 million Americans suffer from one or another kind of hearing impairment, but only 1 million are courageous enough to wear a hearing aid. Thus enabled to physically conceal their deafness, they have created a greater problem.

In the case of students, teachers believe such pupils are indifferent to their studies or backward. In the case of employees, bosses often believe that the man or woman who has concealed the fact that they are hard-of-hearing are uncooperative and poor workers, which is the element that actually retards their progress.

In all instances, the hard-of-hearing who are sensitive about letting the world know of their problem, present very often a hazard to others in the factory or on the highway and public streets.

Paul Smith came to the conclusion that the automobile driver who is hard of hearing or the operator of a factory machine is as much of a menace to his neighbors as a man or woman assuming similar responsibilities who suffer from poor vision. Smith has campaigned among State legislatures and motor vehicle departments to make it mandatory that persons applying for an automobile operator's license submit to a hearing test, just as they must submit to a vision test. This was initiated not so much to sell hearing aids as to inaugurate greater safety on the highways.

The New York State Legislature has recently passed a bill making employers responsible for total compensation for employees' loss of hearing, unless adequate tests have been conducted prior to actual hiring—New York Laws, chapter 974, 1959.

Until a short time ago hearing tests were really catch-as-catch-can undertakings, or else they turned out to be long, embarrassing and detailed processes. The tuning fork methods are outmoded and undependable. The clinical audiometer requires the setting of dials for each ear separately at every stage of testing from 125 cycles per second through 4,000—the full range of normal speech. It is also inaccurate.

Smith prevailed upon William R. Hutchins to create an audiometer which was positively accurate and could be depended upon to give a complete test in a matter of minutes, instead of hours as the ordinary audiometer requires. Hutchins helped Edwin H. Armstrong invent frequency modulation and the superheterodyne. He is currently head of our Government's ballistic missile defense branch of the Institute of Defense Analyses in Washington and the inventor of the guided missile fuse, a polyphase generator and microwave ferrite devices.

In collaboration with James A. Depew, Jr., noted audiologist of New York's famed Eye, Ear, Nose, and Throat Hospital, Hutchins invented the Tonemaster speech frequency audiometer. After exhaustive tests at the New York Eye, Ear, Nose, and Throat Hospital over a period of 4 years in the clinic, the speech frequency audiometer, requiring only a single dial setting and completing tests in seconds, was declared to be 100 percent accurate. It is now in use in schools, hospitals, industrial plants, motor vehicles bureaus, and in private practice.

This instrument, manufactured in Peoria, Ill., has gained world renown and universal acceptance. It is responsible for increased public safety, the improvement of psychological behavior, school marks and employment averages where otherwise believed to be dissident persons were revealed as being guilty of no worse than being hard of hearing.

Smith's second contribution to humanity was the encouragement of his engineers and audiologists to invent and design hearing aids—often no larger than peanuts—which can be worn as earrings, eyeglass frames, or lapel buttons, free of any exposed wires or telltale sound boxes, thus completely concealing the wearer's affliction. This innovation in hearing has bolstered human morale, given assurance and confidence to millions and contributed to public safety and industrial safety. Like the speech frequency audiometer, Tonemaster hearing aids are made and shipped from Peoria to all parts of the world.

Thus a human and benevolent undertaking has brought employment to hundreds of Peoria men and women, enriched the entire community because of the firm's weekly payroll, but more important, enriched the lives of confused thousands and added to the safety of all of us. This is the American way of private enterprise; the story of success won through sheer inventiveness, intensive application of ideas and muscle and the ability to dream and see beyond distant horizons.

The 10th anniversary of Tonemaster Manufacturing Company is therefore not only celebrated now in Peoria by all its people, but it should likewise be at least officially recognized by our democracy as proof that no ideology or state controlled system of government can ever improve upon the doctrine of free men and women in a free economy.

INTERNATIONAL CULTURAL EXCHANGE AND TRADE FAIR—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the provisions of section 9 of Public Law 860 of the 84th Congress, I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the Fifth Semiannual Report of operations under the International Cultural Exchange and Trade Fair Participation Act of 1956.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 13, 1959.

PLENTIFUL SUPPLY OF PURE WATER IS PRINCIPAL NEED OF AMERICA

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, one of the essential requirements of America is plenty of pure water for homes and domestic use, for industry, and for agriculture. Civilizations have risen and fallen because of the existence of an adequate supply or lack of an adequate supply of pure water for use by mankind.

The President's budget cuts funds for water pollution construction grants to $20 million from $45 million authorized and appropriated since passage of Public Law 660. This is complete disregard of one of the principal needs of America. For example, grants to Michigan cities will be cut from $1,394,500 to $561,000, hardly enough to make the program worthwhile in Michigan.

One of the shameful things about this country has been the manner in which we have destroyed, wasted, and squandered our water resources. The worst waste of water is pollution, both municipal sewage dumped into our rivers and streams and dumping industrial wastes into waters which are used by individuals for drinking, bathing, and recreation.

For years the construction rate of sewage disposal and waste treatment plants on the municipal level did not even keep pace with the growth of new population. During World War II and the Korean incident there was virtually no municipal sewage construction work done. In 1956 Public Law 660 of the 84th Congress became law and grants to municipalities on a matching fund basis to clean up municipal sewage began to be felt. In 1957, the first full year of grants under this, witnessed $351 million spent for municipal water pollution abatement plants and facilities. The rate of construction from 1952 to 1956 was only $222 million. In 1958 tentative figures show us that municipalities spent $390 million on sewage abatement facilities. This is the highest year on record. Construction of facilities without Federal assistance still averages about $222 million. The stimulus in construction because of the Federal grants is for 1957 some $130 million and for 1958 some $170 million, or an expenditure of only $45 million in Federal funds.

Clearly, Public Law 660, both insofar as the construction grants feature and insofar as the enforcement feature has been a wonderful thing. It is my hope and the hope of all who are interested in pure water for Americans living and yet unborn that it will be possible to continue the wonderful work being done under this law to clean up our rivers and streams and provide clear, pure water for home use, for industry and for recreation.

I insert here a breakdown showing what the dollar loss to the States will be if the full amount of this program is not appropriated. The loss of higher values is incalculable.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Interstate Highway Repayment Act

OF

HON. CHARLES A. BUCKLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced H.R. 6303, designated as the "Interstate Highway Repayment Act," authorizing appropriations to reimburse States which have built toll and free highways which have been made a part of the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways.

The proposed bill authorizes the appropriation over a 15-year period of the total net reimbursable amount shown on the annexed exhibit A. This amount is based upon the report—House Document No. 301, 85th Congress—of the Secretary of Commerce concerning the depreciated cost of the free or toll roads, or portions thereof, included in the Interstate System.

All funds proposed to be appropriated under this bill are required to be used by the States solely for highway construction on the Federal Aid Primary System. These funds are to be expended under the present Federal aid legislation with certain exceptions. No matching by the States is required. The bill provides for the apportionment of the funds on the basis of the relative contribution made by each State so that the result is that at the end of the 15-year period each State shall have received the matching ratio of its depreciated cost, less any Federal aid payments already made.

This statement supports the proposed bill for the following reasons, each of which is discussed below:

First. There is an obligation to the contributing States.

Second. This obligation should be met at once.

Third. It is feasible to meet it now as done in the proposed bill.

Fourth. Toll roads are entitled to the same credit as free roads.

Fifth. The national interest is well served because the proposed bill provides for the construction of roads where the need is great.

I. THERE IS AN OBLIGATION TO THE CONTRIBUTING STATES

The construction of the Interstate System is a project national in scope. This is recognized by the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1956 when it states in section 108(a):

> It is hereby declared to be essential to the national interest to provide for the early completion of the National System of Interstate Highways.

That section further states that:

> It is the intent of the Congress * * * that the entire system in all the States be brought to simultaneous completion. Because of its primary importance to the national defense the name of such system is hereby change to the "National System of Interstate and Defense Highways."

This declaration by Congress made only a few years ago would seem to make it clear beyond any doubt that we are dealing with a national project.

Other factors also indicate that this conclusion is inescapable. The Federal share payable for this construction varies between 90 and 95 percent of the cost. The standards are uniform throughout the country and are so developed that the highways and bridges will carry military equipment, which was not the case formerly, since in some States the bridges were not designed to support heavy loads and the grades were too steep or the roads were too narrow. It was planned and designed as a National System of Interstate Highways as indicated by the requirements of section 7 of the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1944.

Since in law and in fact it is a national project, it is distinguishable from the usual Federal aid concept. Federal aid is given to the States for a multitude of purposes including the construction of roads. In the usual Federal aid case, funds are required to be matched by the States on a 50 percent basis. Generally Federal aid highway projects are dispersed into a number of different places within a particular State so that all of its counties within a few years may receive the benefit of some new Federal aid road construction. The aid is given to assist and foster highway construction within that particular State. This is a vastly different concept than the concept of the Interstate System which is a National System of connected roads, which is to be brought to simultaneous completion, and constructed because of a national interest in its construction.

The difference is emphasized by the difference in mode of payment. The amount of Federal aid authorized to be appropriated in any given year has been based in a general way on the realization that the States needed assistance in road building and the amount has been gradually increased over the years. But there has been no criterion other than the general need. In the case of the Interstate System the amount of the authorization was based upon the original estimated cost. For ordinary Federal aid, the amount authorized has been apportioned to the individual States on old and established formulas of area, population, and road mileage. The apportionment in the case of the Interstate System is based upon the cost of construction to the individual State of its specified mileage in that State, and when such construction has been completed the apportionment ceases.

Once the difference between usual Federal aid and the construction of the Interstate System is clearly understood, few will dispute that a State which contributes highways or a portion thereof to the Interstate System is entitled to a credit for that construction. The point can be illustrated in numerous ways. For example, if the Federal Government in connection with its establishment of post offices should find certain public buildings in some States adequate and adaptable for use as post offices, certainly no one could contend that because these had already been constructed and were ready for use, the Federal Government would not be required to pay for them; but that it would be required to pay some other State to construct a post office which was not at the time in existence. The position that payment should not be made in either case is clearly untenable. The reason that it seems so clear in the post office case is that the establishment and operation of post offices is a Federal function carried out entirely by the Federal Government.

There is no distinction between the post office case and the highway case, once it is conceded that the construction of the Interstate System is a national project, 90 to 95 percent of the cost of which is paid for by the Federal Government. If a State has supplied a road, or a portion thereof, already constructed, it is just as entitled to a credit for this as it would be if it had contributed an established public building that could be used as a post office.

This point of view has important backing. The Clay Committee report which was submitted to the President in January 1955 after stating that some States had already constructed sections of the Interstate System made this comment at page 21:

> Such construction should not be discouraged by this report since our goal is maximum highway improvement.

> Those States in which sections of the Interstate System have been provided to meet the presently established standards for the completed system should receive appropriate credit.

The suggestions in this report were incorporated in H.R. 4260 and similar bills introduced in 1955. These bills were generally believed to be the administration bills, so that as late as 1955 it may be said that the administration was in favor of giving States a credit for their road construction to the Interstate System.

While it is a fact that in the following year the Secretary of Commerce reversed this position and opposed the inclusion of a provision authorizing a credit in H.R. 8836, it was opposed, not so much on the ground that the States were not entitled to a credit, as on the ground of expediency. In his statement to the committee the Secretary said that he did not favor a credit at the present time—see hearings before Subcommittee on Roads, 1956, page 11. He also stated:

> Obviously more roads can be completed, if those already built are not bought. Furthermore, the States would not appear to be hurt by failure to extend credit for such roads. In general, toll roads have been set up on a sound fiscal basis, and have not cost the States a penny. No amount has been included in the authorizations for the Interstate System for toll and free road credits, and it would, therefore, be necessary to increase the authorizations or cancel a part of the needed program if such credits are to be extended.

The last sentence probably expresses the fundamental reason for the change in position of the Secretary of Commerce. It is usually the principal reason relied on by other persons who oppose recognizing this obligation. The argument is that there is not enough money; that it is not feasible. These persons do not take the position that it is unfair to give the States credit, but rather that it is not feasible so to do. Few persons say that it would be unfair. It is difficult to see how they could.

In conclusion, fair play and equity demand that this obligation be recognized and that a credit be allowed those States which have constructed highways or portions thereof on the Insterstate System, and thus relieve the Federal Government of a tremendous expenditure for a project of national scope which was planned in the national interest.

II. THIS OBLIGATION SHOULD BE MET AT ONCE

Four years have elapsed since the Clay report and the introduction of the first bills with respect to authorizing funds for the Interstate System. Three years have elapsed since the passage of the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1956 which did authorize the necessary funds. Section 114 of the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1956 represented a temporary solution of the controversy between those persons favoring a credit for free and toll roads and those opposed. It was a solution that seemed sound at the time. No one could state with any accuracy at that time which roads would be incorporated into the Interstate System and what they cost. A definite basis for action prior to a final decision by Congress seemed advisable. This was accomplished by section 114.

The report called for by section 114 was transmitted to the House on January 7, 1958, and has been designated as House Document No. 301. A hearing was held on this report before the Committee on Public Works on March 25–26, 1958. No action was taken following that hearing.

The necessary facts are set forth in that report and there is no reason for further delay. Fair play requires the immediate recognition of this obligation to the contributing States. It is no answer to say that the Federal Government cannot afford at this time to meet this obligation. These are the most prosperous times according to all business statistics that this Nation has yet encountered. If this obligation cannot be met today, it never can be met. Postponement is not an answer.

Most persons who urge postponement, and yet do not argue that it would be inequitable or unfair to allow this credit, are in effect stating that the Federal Government is not in a position to meet its just obligations. It is, indeed, a sad commentary on our moral conscientiousness that expediency should rule, rather than equity. There is an obligation or there isn't an obligation. If there is one, it should be repaid at once. Part I of this statement clearly demonstrates that there is such an obligation.

III. IT IS FEASIBLE TO MEET THIS OBLIGATION TODAY

The proposed bill authorizes appropriations over a 15-year period commencing with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1962. While these authorizations total the net reimbursable amount shown by exhibit A of $4,295,600,000, the amounts involved for any one fiscal year range between $225,000,000 and $360,000,000. These annual authorizations are clearly within a feasible area.

Apportionments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1962, must be made prior to January 1, 1961, and therefore will be made probably in the fall of 1960. Thus, the States will be entitled to contract for the work on the basis of the apportionments next year. They will also have the knowledge of the definite amounts that will be apportioned to them over the ensuing 15 years.

The proposed authorization for a 15-year period departs from the usual authorization of Federal aid for roads in that the regular Federal aid authorizations are generally for a 2-year period. However, this would not be the first departure from the usual practice, since the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1956 authorized the entire original estimated cost of the Interstate System to be spread over a 13-year period. The reason in that case was the need for constructing the Interstate System as an entirety, and for the States to have knowledge of their apportionments so that they could engage in long-range planning. The reason was adequate, and Congress approved the long-term authorizations spreading over 13 years. There is also an adequate reason for a similar long-term authorization in the proposed bill. There is an obligation to be repaid, and the only way to repay it is to authorize payment of the entire obligation. Spreading it over a 15-year period does this in a feasible way.

It is provided in the bill that appropriations can be made from general treasury funds, not otherwise appropriated, rather than from the highway trust fund created by section 209 of the Highway Revenue Act of 1956. The reason for this is clear. The Federal Government is repaying an obligation. The repayment of an obligation should not be contingent. It should be certain and fixed. The highway trust fund is contingent, depending upon the amount of revenues collected. The proposed bill is a clear authorization for appropriations and apportionments which will permit contracts to be entered into by the States after the apportionments have been made. The only way the Federal Government can repay its obligation is to make it fixed and certain.

Certainly it is clearly feasible in this day of $70 billion budgets to authorize the appropriation of from $225 million to $360 million per annum over a 15-year period. The contention that the Federal Government cannot afford to meet its just obligation to the contributing States has no basis whatsoever under the proposed bill.

IV. TOLL ROADS ARE ENTITLED TO BE PLACED IN THE SAME CATEGORY AS FREE ROADS

At the outset, it is important to understand the distinction between Federal aid for the construction of a toll road and the inclusion of a toll road on a Federal aid system. In 1921 Congress enacted a provision—section 9—in the Highway Act of that year to the effect "that all highways constructed or reconstructed under the provisions of this act shall be free from tolls of all kinds." At the time of the enactment of this provision there were many toll bridges throughout the country, toll ferries, and also some toll roads. Many of these facilities were entirely private; that is, had been constructed by privately owned corporations for profit. Congress undoubtedly felt that it was undesirable to have Federal money go into private enterprise. It is important to bear in mind that there was no opposition to toll facilities as such, but rather to the use of Federal funds in their construction. The proposed bill contemplates the construction of free roads, like any other Federal aid funds.

That the Federal Government was not opposed to toll roads as such is indicated by the fact that in many instances toll bridges and toll ferries were included in the Federal aid primary system. There has not been any opposition to this inclusion down to the present time. In fact, in the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1956 Congress included section 113 which specifically provides for the inclusion of toll roads, bridges, and tunnels within the Interstate System. The entire history of Federal road legislation therefore indicates clearly that the Federal Government has never opposed toll facilities. It not only has made use of them to complete its earlier Federal aid systems, but now is making use of them on the Interstate System.

Not only is the foregoing true, but since 1927 the Federal Government has participated in the cost of toll bridges and tunnels. The 1927 act and subsequent acts have been incorporated into section 129 of title 23, United States Code. While Federal participation is subject to certain restrictions principally directed towards making the facility free as quickly as possible, it is clearly another indication of the fact that the Federal Government, far from opposing toll roads, even goes to the extent of participating in the cost of the construction of toll roads and bridges.

In view of the foregoing, it is difficult to understand the objection to giving a credit for toll roads. One of the most frequent arguments used is the statement that the traveler has to pay a toll, as well as a tax on gasoline, motor fuel, and any other so-called highway user taxes, the proceeds of which are used for highway construction. An analysis of this argument indicates that it is based upon a false premise. The false premise is that the highway user taxes in all States are the same. In fact they are not. The rates of these taxes vary from State to State.

If these taxes were uniform in all of the States it might be claimed that the toll road user was being subjected to an extra burden for the use of the highway. Whether such an extra burden should, by itself, warrant a refusal to allow a credit for a toll road is highly questionable. The road is there and available for use. Its use must be economical or travelers would not pay the tolls. The construction of a free parallel road would be an economic waste. All of these considerations indicate that the contention is invalid even if the premise were sound.

However, these taxes are not uniform. A person traveling across the country pays one tax in one State and another in another. When a traveler goes from State A where he has paid a 4-cent tax into State B where he has paid a 7-cent tax he is paying more for the use of the highway just as he is when he uses a toll road and pays the toll. Can it be claimed that State B, because it charges a higher tax, should not receive credit for its free roads since it places an extra burden on the traveler from State A? To put the question is to answer it. Obviously our whole form of government contemplates that the different States may have different laws and different taxes. When the user of a toll road pays a toll, he does no more than pay a higher tax, just as he does in a State which charges him a higher tax for his gasoline. Certainly the payment of the toll cannot be a fair ground for differentiation between giving a State a credit or not giving a State a credit.

This is clearly true when it is borne in mind that roads usually are paid for by the people who use them. It is indeed difficult to understand why the form of the tax should require a distinction. In some States roads are paid for out of the general treasury and it is not possible to trace just which taxes were used, although the so-called highway user taxes contribute to the general funds. In other States containing constitutional provisions against diversion of certain highway user taxes it is easy to point to the particular tax which pays for the roads. In the case of toll roads the construction is paid for by the person who actually uses that particular road. Whether the taxes are paid from the general funds, from specific so-called highway user taxes, or by the person using the road is immaterial insofar as the ultimate fact is concerned that the road is there, that it is being used, and that it is part of the Interstate System.

Another argument advanced against the recognition of toll roads is that those States contributing toll roads would not be hurt, because the toll roads do not cost the States a penny. In the first place, the question is not whether the States would be hurt or would not be hurt, but whether they are entitled to a credit. It has been pointed out above that, since these States have supplied the roads and the toll is merely another form of tax, they clearly are entitled to a credit. Accordingly, this negative approach or argument loses its force at the outset.

However, it can be said with equal force that the free roads have not cost the States a penny where there is a constitutional provision against diversion of highway user taxes, or where there has been no increase in such taxes since the passage of the Hayden Cartright Act by Congress. In these States the highway user taxes are paid, but they are not received by the State as general funds. They are required to be used only for road construction purposes, and for no other purpose. What is the difference between one of these States and a State that has created an authority for the construction of a toll road which is being paid for by those persons actually using the toll road. In neither case has the State paid a penny out of its general funds. In both cases the tax or the toll has gone directly into the roads. Whether it cost the State a penny is immaterial to this discussion. The effect on the State treasury is the same in both cases. When these considerations are taken into account it is indeed difficult from this point of view to distinguish between free and toll roads in many of the States of this country.

Before closing on this point the actual economic benefit of the toll road should not be forgotten. The toll road would not have been constructed at the outset unless it was believed that the need was there. In most cases the estimates were accurate enough so that the toll roads have succeeded. They must be considered beneficial by the traveling public or persons using them would not continue to do so. It is also true that no one is compelled to use toll roads and that there is always a road paralleling the toll road which may be used by a person not desiring to pay the toll. Toll roads are not monopolies, but the traveler always has his choice and can take either a toll road or a free road.

Toll roads are entitled to consideration and should be placed in the same category as free roads. The Federal Government has not been opposed to toll roads and in fact has included them in the Interstate System. It is therefore getting the use out of them. The toll in fact is analogous to a user tax. Taxes vary in the different States so there is no uniform base upon which a person from one State can claim to be penalized by traveling through another. There is variety in every State. It is a question of degree rather than kind. The contention that a toll road does not cost a State a penny is a negative argument rather than a positive argument, and is equally applicable to many States with antidiversion provisions. Finally, the proposed bill does not contemplate the use of Federal funds in the construction of toll roads. It will not be contrary to the longstanding provision of the 1921 act that highways constructed with Federal funds shall be free from tolls.

V. THE NATIONAL INTEREST IS WELL SERVED BECAUSE THE PROPOSED BILL PROVIDES FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF ROADS WHERE THE NEED IS GREAT

The proposed bill requires the States to use the funds authorized for construction of highways under the Federal aid primary system. It limits the use of these funds to this system because it is felt that the primary system is the most important system and construction of roads on it will contribute most to the present highway needs. It does not provide for use of these funds on the Interstate System because it is felt that the mileage of the Interstate System should be limited to the 41,000 miles now authorized, at least until those 41,000 miles have been entirely completed.

Use of the funds for more roads on the primary system will be helpful in contributing to the highway needs of this country where the need is clearly apparent. The States which built the free roads and toll roads in the decade following the war did so to meet the pressing needs of that decade. No toll road could succeed unless the demand of the traffic was sufficient to insure its use. No freeway would be necessary except for heavy traffic. It must be borne in mind that all these roads eligible for the Interstate System were built to standards which accommodate a heavy traffic load. Those States which were the largest contributors to the Interstate System had the heaviest traffic demands. It seems likely that this demand will continue just as heavy in the ensuing decade. The proposed bill will contribute to this need and will place the funds in those States where the need is clearly urgent.

VI. CONCLUSION

The proposed bill will accomplish two important objectives.

In the first place, it repays a valid obligation of the Federal Government to the States. The Federal Government has used facilities of the States to support a project clearly national in its scope and purpose, and their contribution to this national project is an obligation which in all fairness and equity should be repaid.

In the second place, it requires the funds to be used exclusively for highway construction, and they will be so used to the greatest extent in those States where the need is clearly urgent. Both objectives make serious consideration of the proposed bill imperative.

Where Federal Aid to Schools Would Have No Strings

OF
HON. THOMAS M. PELLY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I am joining certain other Members of the House of Representatives and have introduced legislation to provide that expenditures in connection with the submission to an electorate of issues affecting the business of a taxpayer shall be allowed as a deduction under the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

This bill would read in part as follows:

No expenditure which otherwise qualifies as an ordinary and necessary business expense * * * shall be disallowed as a deduction because incurred in opposing or advocating measures duly submitted to an electorate upon any issue affecting the business of the taxpayer.

My thought is, Mr. Speaker, that in many local matters, such as school bond issues, the cost of informing the public is a business and civic, not a political, expense and has an important effect on the taxpayer and his business.

I have in mind that other desirable or necessary elections for local improvements not alone for schools but for municipal and State facilities of all kinds would be affected. Public support could be enlisted, with the incentive in my bill, for parks, playgrounds, civic centers, urban renewal projects, and all manner of worthy and meritorious issues requiring a vote of the people. However, I am thinking in particular of educational bond authorizations or school levies where under election laws many times the referendum fails for want of information or adequate public interest. The outcome of these elections is certainly one of community welfare and affects the customers and employees of business firms themselves in the area. In my congressional district often bond issues voted on to provide funds received majority approval, but the measures fail due to an insufficient number of voters going to the polls and a required legal percentage of total votes not being cast. Defeat is due to lack of publicity and promotion.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that with passage of this legislation contributions to groups such as parent-teacher organizations and chambers of commerce, by public spirited citizens or organizations would become tax deductible as a normal and proper business expense. I want to make it clear my purpose is not to allow deductions of gifts to personal political campaigns, although frankly I would not be against limited deductions of that nature, but this legislation would cover public issues only and not personalities or people.

Also, let me explain, as one who fears Federal controls, that the purpose of my bill is to make it easier for local communities to do things for themselves rather than to be forced to come to the Federal Government for help.

Take education as the case in point. If State and local financing is insufficient, the pressure increases on the national level. The only answer, I can see, is to assist communities and encourage them to accept their responsibility. In the case of schools, classroom shortages must be filled and teachers must be paid decent salaries. To turn to the Federal Treasury in order to provide these needs may be the easier way but it is the wrong way in my opinion.

For example, the National Defense Act was passed last year. I voted against it because I just could not, in all conscience, support a program putting the Federal Government further in the education business. Most educators in my district did not seem to worry on this score, but I am sure they have recognized that my opposition to Federal aid is genuine and they respected my objections. Educators do not favor Federal controls, but they favor adequate funds, and I do too. So we agree to a great extent. Our State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Lloyd J. Andrews, has agreed with me about the danger of Federal school aid and on the basis of actual experience he has found that Federal programs always include Federal requirements and standards, which a State must accept or else it forfeits the funds. I support his stand as to the threat of Federal aid.

However, I agree if local communities shirk their responsibilities then there is no alternative—the school boards must look to other sources of income.

Out in my State recently in order to increase voter activity and obtain needed percentage of votes in a school election, voter registration campaigns have been conducted. Teams of members of eight parent-teacher association units covered shopping districts of Bothel, Woodinville and Kenmore, which is mostly in my congressional district. With registration books scheduled to close shortly, prospective voters in Northshore School District 417 were canvassed. Through the courtesy of the Aero Mechanics Union a mobile registration bus was stationed in the population centers, and PTA workers in various stores enlisted new registration. A special deputy registrar was appointed so it was not necessary for eligible voters who were not registered to go to the county official's office.

If business contributions toward advertising this drive had been deductible, the drive could have been much more effective, and of course this is only one example of where donations in behalf of community or State campaigns submitted to the electorate could increase voter response and make democracy more effective.

Here is a means of assisting local groups to inform the voters on issues. It deserves consideration.

Bataan Day

OF
HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND
OF MASSACHUSETTS
Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, the evil days of World War II bequeathed us many unhappy memories and untold miseries. For more than 3 years our fate and future seemed to be in jeopardy, and at times the whole issue was kept in precarious suspense. The day of infamy, which began with Pearl Harbor, cast a pall over the Nation that grew darker with the fall of Bataan 4 months later. During those months and long thereafter the whole free world, and we in the United States as its leader, were on trial—physically, spiritually, ideally, and morally. And in that supreme trial, that life-consuming and soul-scorching trial, many had their finest hour. We survived; we overcame the enemy; and finally were victorious through the sterling qualities of our fighting forces on all fronts. And those qualities: resourcefulness and resiliency, tenacity and ingenuity, proved their worth better at Bataan than anywhere else during the early phase of the war.

OUR FORCES OUTNUMBERED AND EXHAUSTED

Our forces, numbering about 20,000, plus about 100,000 Philippine citizen army, were no match for Japan's more than 200,000 seasoned troops. The enemy had succeeded in eliminating our Air Force there; the island was cut off from the outside world; and the best of the combined American-Filipino forces were cornered at the strategic Bataan Peninsula. At Bataan our isolated and far outnumbered forces withstood the unrelenting and intensive enemy attack for more than 3 months. Finally, when sheer physical exhaustion doomed our forces, they surrendered to the enemy on April 9, 1942, 17 years ago. In that great battle, waged far from our shores, our men proved their bravery and courage, and they willingly sacrificed their lives for the good and glory of their beloved country. On this anniversary we bow our heads and pray for their blessed memory.

CURRENT AMERICAN-PHILIPPINES RELATIONS

Mr. Speaker, the New York Times of last Thursday printed a timely editorial on the Bataan Day anniversary and it pointed up recent events in American-Philippines relations which should be of concern to every Member of this House.

I had originally asked permission last Friday to include this editorial with my remarks above, but later I learned that the New York Times editorial had been inserted in the RECORD by Senator KEATING of New York. I want to take this opportunity to express my complete agreement with the editorial relative to Filipino loyalty and the matter of outstanding Philippine claims.

Letters to the Editor

OF
HON. A. S. HERLONG, JR.
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, you will remember that some time ago Elmo Roper made a study of the earmarks of the active citizen. One of these behavior patterns was the habit of writing letters to the editor. It is for that reason that I call your attention to two major articles in the Editor and Publisher, the fourth estate's trade journal, dated January 31 and February 14. These articles were based on two reports issued by the Center for Practical Politics located at Rollins College in my Fifth Florida District. These reports, in which there has been national interest, are entitled "Policy of Florida Newspapers on Letters to the Editor" and "Letters to the Editor," a content analysis case history of letters written by a citizen with a socialist background to a conservative southern newspaper.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my reason for mentioning these studies is that the Orlando Sentinel, one of the great newspapers of America, is located in my district, and prints more letters to the editor than any other newspaper in Florida. The study makes that fact clear. Martin Andersen, the Sentinel's publisher, says he thinks he publishes more letters than any other newspaper in the world. Anyway, I want to emphasize the importance of these letters in our great democracy. The Sentinel says it has found it good business, that it gets more reaction per printed word from its 100,000 circulation than most newspapers twice the size. It provides readers with a voice of their own. The Sentinel uses that voice to back up its editorial policy or to make the editor back down. In either case, it circulates ideas for the improvement of the Sentinel's service to the community.

Mr. Andersen says he gets letters written in stubby pencil on penny tablets and old wrapping paper; on rag paper with electric typewriters; on special stationery from elderly people; on childish sheets from youngsters just beginning to form words. About half the daily volume of letters are handwritten.

I wish to say "on the record," Mr. Speaker, that the Orlando Sentinel is operating as an engine of democracy in providing this important channel for the interaction of opinions. I congratulate Martin Andersen and the Center for Practical Politics on their teamwork in encouraging active citizenship.

Washington Report

OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newsletter of April 11, 1959, to constituents:

WASHINGTON REPORT
(By Congressman BRUCE ALGER)
APRIL 11, 1959.

The clash of traditional constitutional government of Federal-State prerogatives against ever-increasing Federal centralization was never better demonstrated than in the Unemployment Compensation Act of 1959, during public hearings which are now before the Ways and Means Committee. The proponents of the bill are attempting to prove the bill's stated findings that: (1)

States are failing to carry out the purposes and objectives of employment stabilization and security against unemployment; (2) the benefit amounts paid aren't enough; (3) State programs vary, are not uniform in eligibility, amount, and duration of benefits. Therefore, to strengthen the economy and provide for the general welfare of the Nation, it is necessary to impose Federal standards on the States. Witnesses testifying included economists, employment experts, business representatives (mostly opposed), and AFL–CIO spokesmen, culminating this week with Mr. George Meany, AFL–CIO president.

Present law continues the original intent of leaving jurisdiction in the States. State legislatures, therefore, have each developed their programs to solve their own unemployment. Employers of four or more pay a tax generally of 3 percent on each employee's first $3,000 of income. Federal Government requires States to pay in three-tenths of 1 percent of this for Federal administrative costs. States are permitted to charge whatever tax they choose to meet their needs, although all States must extend each employer a reduced tax rate commensurate with the stability of employment in his company. This is called experience rating. In 1958, the estimated average State tax was 1.4 percent; 5 States were paying 2.7 percent, while 12 States were paying less than 1 percent. Each State maintains its own reserve fund and can borrow without interest from the Federal Government. The States have $7 billion on hand for unemployment contingencies. The legislatures are representative of the people's wishes and the present law is the result of agreement of labor and management at the State level. The very flexibility of State law matches the varying economic patterns and needs of the Nation.

So it is a matter of grave concern to me that labor leaders now attempt to brand the States as failures in this field. Should they succeed in changing the law without proving their allegations with facts, this Nation will have sustained another body blow threatening the very freedom and solvency of every citizen. Consider these facts, in relation to imposing Federal standards: (1) The employer pays all the tax, the employee nothing; (2) we are told we must force the States to broaden eligibility, to increase benefits and duration, regardless of State experience; (3) increased taxes to business means higher costs, thus higher prices to consumers. Labor leaders, therefore, would be cutting everyone's buying power in imposing arbitrary increases; (4) increased taxes and costs to business could force more labor layoff and so more unemployment; (5) the unemployed drawing benefits are over 50 percent without dependents, including seasonal workers, and family members where others in the family work, too—so it isn't the family head primarily being helped; (6) actually, we have gone beyond the area of temporary unemployment compensation and are treating welfare and relief on the one hand or the need for more jobs on the other; (7) the increased benefit wages are getting close to the worker's take-home pay; we are placing a premium on idleness and evasion of working, drawing benefits instead; (8) we are asked to forget the judgment of 7,613 State legislators; (9) the most heavily unionized areas, represented by the Detroit mayor and AFL–CIO leaders, are the ones most desiring Federal control. Having the greatest failure in providing jobs, these men plead most for unemployment compensation.

It seems it's time we tried to create new job opportunities locally—not beg for Federal control and aid. Whether new jobs or relief are needed, it's certainly not a "guaranteed annual wage" for not working. Oddly enough, that seems to be the aim, intended or not. Labor leaders want Federal control—why? So they can straitjacket the Nation? To do what they've done to Michigan—a bankruptcy of economy and ideas? No matter how sincere their intentions, leaders of the 13.5 million AFL–CIO workers cannot be allowed to run roughshod over the 67 million labor force—nor should labor leaders get by unquestioned as representatives of 13.5 million workers.

I suggested to Mr. Meany that the U.C. Federal standards would defeat his stated purposes to relieve unemployment and increase purchasing power; rather it would do the opposite. The real trouble (beyond the political power of labor leaders over Congressmen) is the Full Employment Act of 1946 which Mr. Meany admittedly likes. This act, through broad language, makes the Federal Government responsible for everyone working—this exceeds the constitutional prerogatives of Federal Government. It should be repealed.

The U.C. debate proves again the failure of some to understand, even recognize, the blessings of the constitutional balance of power between State and Federal Government, and the dangers in destroying this balance.

Address by the Honorable Fred A. Seaton, Secretary of the Interior, at Gettysburg College Convocation

OF
HON. WILLIAM H. AVERY
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, the following is a very outstanding address given by the Honorable Fred A. Seaton, Secretary of the Interior, Gettysburg College convocation, Gettysburg, Pa., Friday, April 3, 1959.

I highly recommend that each Member of Congress read Mr. Seaton's remarks:

ADDRESS BY THE HONORABLE FRED A. SEATON, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, GETTYSBURG COLLEGE CONVOCATION, GETTYSBURG, PA., APRIL 3, 1959

It is a rare honor for me to speak tonight of the liberal arts, of education, and of history here at Gettysburg—the scene of a historic battle between the North and the South, the site of an immortal address, and the home of a great President of the United States.

What more fitting place can there be to do this, than here in the chapel of a college, founded 127 years ago—Gettysburg College—whose very name encompasses that battle, the presidential speech of dedication and the home address of President Eisenhower?

More than a century ago Daniel Webster said of his beloved Dartmouth College, up in the New Hampshire wilderness, "It is little, yet there are those who love it."

How fortunate we are that, by and large, liberal arts colleges all over the United States still enjoy such loyalty from their trustees, alumni, other supporters, and from their undergraduates.

That is not to say the future of independent colleges and universities is assured. There are many people, and they include some prominent names in education, who fear that the days of many small, independent colleges are numbered.

They see ahead an ascending curve of costs and of enrollments which give them doubt that tuition fees and private gifts can be increased enough to insure financial solvency. In short, they believe altogether too many of the Nation's independent educational institutions either will be eventually forced to close their doors, thus losing their very existence, or necessarily turn to State or Federal Governments for money, thus losing their independence.

I do not concur in such a prophecy. On the contrary, I believe there are valid reasons why these sincere and well-meant doubters will prove to be wrong.

For an example, in February the Council for Financial Aid to Education reported that nongovernmental contributions to educational and general income of American colleges and universities had risen from a World War II level of 41 percent to a current level of 51 percent of the total. In other words, despite massive increases in Federal grants for research, nongovernmental sources of financial aid had produced so much more as to take the lead.

It is important to note there is no apparent reason to question in the foreseeable future a continuance of this rising curve of support.

This is welcome encouragement to all believers, as I am emphatically am, in the national necessity of keeping one sector of American higher education, and a large and most influential sector, vigorously independent of any form of governmental direction.

Admittedly, an encouragement in itself is not an automatic guarantee, and we must confess much remains to be done to make it so.

For one thing, the council estimates that in just a decade, American colleges of whatever description will need for all purposes, for current operations, plant, and equipment, and endowment, about $9 billion a year, or twice the amount they now have.

Right there, some will say: "How can you expect gifts, tuition, and fees to go up enough to do the job while governmental support of all kinds goes up as well?"

That is a good question, but in answer, I think you can properly remind them that, in the past decade, tuition and fees have already gone up almost 130 percent and private gifts and grants 247 percent, while Government help has increased by 63 percent.

On the evidence, I believe this: We can accomplish the task before us if we do three things—positively inform the American people of the importance of the educational job to be done, plainly tell them the cost of that job, and emphasize the necessity of refusing to permit any source, including the Federal Government, to acquire a monopoly over American education.

I sincerely believe one of the greatest services each of us can render to our colleges, our country, and our fellow citizens is to rouse up more active support for privately financed education.

There's a second job which is inextricably entwined with this first one, and that is to help make certain that the American dollar retains its power to buy.

All our educational institutions, of whatever description, have a life and death interest in that.

To illustrate, here are some sad but true fiscal facts.

In 1929–30, the total current income of American colleges and universities was $555 million; by 1953–54 it was nearly $3 billion, almost 5½ times as much. Now, on the face of it, that seems wonderful, but a particularly vicious and stealthy thief, inflation, was at work. That thief stole away so much of the value of the dollar that by 1954 it was worth only 62 cents. Simply put, that meant for every dollar the universities and colleges gained in income, they lost 38 cents to price increases.

You cannot get away from the fact that inflation hurt these institutions. And specifically it hurt their faculty members.

While it is true that in the past 20 years the dollar tag on teachers' salaries has indeed been going up, it is just as true that all the while the purchasing power of those salaries has been going down.

Universities and colleges can hardly be expected to put escalator clauses into their administrative and teaching contracts. That's because nobody can guarantee them escalator clauses in their incomes. Professors can't dodge inflation simply because universities and colleges can't either.

What they can do, and I hope they will, is to join with those of us who are working with all our might for fiscal integrity in government, whether it is local, State or Federal.

In that connection, we have only to recall to mind one widely publicized situation as proof that such an endeavor should be our common cause.

In Michigan, a political force under a professedly liberal banner has for a decade avoided the hard realities of the management of the State's finances and relied heavily on deficit financing. As a result, the Governor of Michigan is presently known far and wide as a dealer in deficits.

Today, after 10 years, the people of Michigan have finally found out that there is no such thing as a free lunch: Sooner or later somebody has to pick up the check, with interest charges added.

As of today, Michigan has a $7 million lag in old age and children's aid funds. It is $27 million short on payments to its public schools. It is $15 million behind in payments to its three leading State universities.

As a result, Michigan State University and the University of Michigan have had to go to banks to get money to meet their payrolls.

No wonder some of the best faculty members are looking elsewhere for jobs.

What has really happened in Michigan is that for too long the present was allowed to cannibalize the future.

Now, I ask you, is a governmental policy which leads to such a deplorable state of affairs a truly liberal one? Or is it only openhanded to the extent that everybody's pockets finally get emptied?

Certainly, as citizens, without regard to politics, we have every reason to abhor the preemption, the narrowing, and the twisting of the word liberal by men who, on their own record, have traded away any legitimate title to it.

Once trained to define and divide, a process which Aristole considered central to the pursuit of knowledge, you should be able, I believe to distinguish liberalism from prodigality.

You should be equipped to see through the self-styled liberal whose liberalism largely consists of advocating more and more public spending and who thus simultaneously undermines, in the end, even governments' power to borrow money to carry on the very programs he espouses.

And you should be able to penetrate the disguise of those who oppose all progress by resisting every demand the Government enter into new fields or accentuate its share of responsibility in old fields by crying "Socialism." Those people, left to their own devices, would have us mentally replant our feet in the 19th century and resist every attempt to move us forward to the present.

What I am saying is that there is a sensible and sane middle ground between the two schools of political and economic thought and it is our solemn obligation to search it out.

Finally, you should be capable of detecting the inconsistency of the self-styled intellectual who cries out that politicians are never the leaders of thought in a society and simultaneously calls for an administration in Washington to produce new ideas.

Here in Gettysburg, as a result of living, working, and studying in the midst of historical surroundings, all of you—young and old—should surely be able and ready to help make our country's future in every way worthy of its glorious past.

Here, despite Lincoln's modest disclaimer, the Gettysburg Address and the deeds of brave men, living and dead, northern and southern all together, have consecrated Cemetery Ridge and Little Round Top and the Wheatfield. This is indeed hallowed ground, and here, to rich and poor, and young and old; patriotism, virtue, honor, and freedom all have, in Shakespeare's phrase, a "local habitation and a name."

Ever since Biblical times, when the author of "Ecclesiasticus" said, "Let us now praise famous men," peoples have found in their honored heritage from the past a guide and an inspiration for the performance of their duty in the present and in the future.

Gettysburg is indeed a place of such praise. You and I will agree that it must always be so, and further you and I agree that together we can keep it so.

When the question is asked, "What is the importance of all such shrines and monuments and parks?" to answer "Manifold" is not to be in error. Surely, many of us have had the same experience as the young soldier in the U.S. Army who wrote to John D. Rockefeller, Jr., that he had never seen "the greatness of this country with more force and clearness" than when he had walked the red brick sidewalks of the Duke of Gloucester Street in Williamsburg.

The monuments which visitors come to see are in themselves clues to a pattern of events which Sir Winston Churchill has woven into the "History of All English-Speaking Peoples." Moreover, our history is also becoming a part of that of many other peoples and races—some speaking such strange tongues as Hindi and Bahasa-Indonesia and Urdu, living in faraway lands, worshiping in vastly different ways.

On the other side of the world, the President of Indonesia, Sukarno, professes almost a veneration for Abraham Lincoln and Thomas Jefferson. The American town of Concord, Mass., and nearby Walden Pond are, through Mahatma Ghandi's admiration for Henry David Thoreau, part—and an almost central part—of the history of modern India. Our monuments—and the human feelings they have awakened in distant, different peoples beyond the seas—indeed, remind us again and again that no man is an island, any more than a nation is an isolated citadel.

Do you recall the words of Carl Sandburg on February 12 of this year, when he addressed a joint session of Congress in honor of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln? "The people of many other countries take Lincoln now for their own," Mr Sandburg said. "He belongs to them. He stands for decency, honest dealing, plain talk, and funny stories. Look where he came from—don't he know all us strugglers and wasn't he a kind of tough struggler all his life up to the finish?"

Surely, in a time when the United States is trying to advance the cause of understanding and mutual aid with people all over the free world—all kinds of people, a good many of them strugglers—isn't it only practical for us to praise the famous men of our history, to share their example of deeds and devotion to the cause of liberty?

Abraham Lincoln, George Washington, Thomas Jefferson—few countries have anybody like them. Surely, we should be lacking in humility and be unwise in the extreme to forget them or our other great men and places, and the examples and lessons they have taught us.

Theodore Roosevelt once said, "There is nothing more practical in the end than the preservation of beauty." Agreeing, we can add: "There is also nothing more practical than the preservation of those places which cause us to remember the great days and great men in our history and which help show people all over the world what we as a nation really are."

It is to those ends that historians and scholars study the past. And it is to those ends that, in Lincoln's own words, we preserve the honored battlefield and the marble monument along with the well assured and more enduring one in the heart.

To study the past, to act in the present, to consider carefully the future—and to do all three with wisdom and magnanimity—those are the continuing obligations of every educated man and woman.

In our time, not only the searching for but the finding of the correct answers to these problems is more important than it has ever been before. That is so, you see, because the atomic and hyrdogen age neither brooks delay nor allows mistake, lest man perish by his own hand and his own works.

As we are gathered here, we can be sure all mankind cries out in its heart for peace, no matter what some mad men may say or do.

How else, I ask you, can we sustain such a state of world affairs, if we do not, in the Apostle Paul's own words, "follow after the things which make for peace"?

You students here at Gettysburg College, a Christian educational institution, are being trained to meet this great challenge as are your fellows everywhere. Your college is doing its best for you. It now remains for you to do your best for it, for yourselves, and for your country in the years ahead.

The Greater Cleveland Council No. 440 of the Boy Scouts of America

OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 13, 1959

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, in January of this year, Greater Cleveland Council No. 440 of the Boy Scouts of America adopted an ambitious 10-year program known as the Greater Cleveland plan. It is designed to make possible a tremendous growth in Boy Scout membership each year until 1968, when it is hoped that the Greater Cleveland area can serve some 82,000 boys. This would be 50 percent of all available boys at that time. The plan not only envisions reaching all boys who desire to be scouts, but provides for a continual up-grading of the program offered.

It was gratifying for me to learn last week, Mr. Speaker, that the plan now having been in effect for 3 months, can point to more than 110 new scout units registered during that short period. One hundred ten units in 3 months is more than the number registered in any previous 1-year period.

I wish to congratulate the leaders in the Greater Cleveland council. They are men of vision and high purpose. They seek to make the opportunities of Scouting possible for thousands of new boys each year, and they are ever alert to see that the quality of the program offered shall be increasingly good. During these past 3 months, the leaders have seen that the master plan of operation was carefully drawn and is both practical and workable. The one element yet to be proven is their faith that the people of Greater Cleveland will back their council with the necessary support, in both time and money.

Service hours totaling hundreds of thousands are given each year by dedicated volunteers in order to make effective the splendid character-citizenship training program of the Boy Scouts of America. If these hours were to be translated into dollars and cents, the price of the Boy Scout program would be staggering. Since this is not the case, however, Scout budget needs are very very modest indeed. Particularly is this seen by comparing the Scout budget with a recent request from two correctional institutions in the Cleveland area, which have asked for $185 million for rehabilitation purposes. How much better to put only a fraction of this cost into the ounce of prevention the Scouting movement represents.

The Boy Scout program all over America is doing a truly magnificent job in fostering the ideals of true Americanism in our growing boys. In fact, I am inclined to agree with the statement once made by the beloved Will Rogers, "The only trouble with the Boy Scouts is there just ain't enough of them."

The Greater Cleveland council is to be commended on making a sincere effort to remedy that situation.

Moscow's Cold War Air Force

OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, in recent weeks the Russian-provoked crisis over Berlin has again focused the attention of the West on that island of democracy behind the Iron Curtain. Though 10 years have already passed since the blockade of Berlin, we are reminded of the hastily organized but highly successful Berlin airlift. From the end of June 1948, to the 12th of May 1949, when the blockade was lifted, more than 2 million tons of foodstuff, coal, and other goods were airlifted into West Berlin in approximately 200,000 flights.

It was a magnificent achievement by the men and the planes of the immediate postwar era—before the advent of the jet age, when there was no question of America's air supremacy over Soviet Russia.

Today, however, we are faced with a new cold-war threat from Russia. Quite apart from their military aspirations, we see the Soviets using the jet plane as an economic and propaganda weapon in the growing commercial battle for jet age supremacy.

My distinguished colleague, Senator BARTLETT, of Alaska, and a member of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, recently spoke of this threat in a speech before the Queens County Committee of the American Legion, in Jamaica, N.Y. I ask unanimous consent that his well-documented talk on "Moscow's Cold War Air Force" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOSCOW'S COLD WAR AIR FORCE

For the past several years, our newspapers and our radio and television broadcasts have carried in great detail the latest developments in the international arms race between our Nation and the U.S.S.R.

In recent months, this struggle for world supremacy has even been carried beyond the limits of our atmosphere into the void of space.

Aside from the military significance of these fantastic developments, the news about them is in itself important. The word of progress on the part of either great competitor reaches every enlightened corner of the world. Each success or failure affects the prestige of the nation concerned, and prestige is an extremely important factor in influencing the peoples of the world who waver between espousal of the democratic or the communistic way of life.

To you opinion leaders, who I am sure have followed closely each of these new developments in defense, I can offer nothing new on the subject of our defense posture vis-a-vis the Soviet Union. Instead I would like to talk tonight about another area of competition between the United States and the Soviets. It is one which has not been so widely publicized, but one which rivals defense progress in the international prestige battle. It is also highly important to the relative economic status of the two nations.

This is the field of civil air transportation, an area in which I have a dual interest both as member of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, which studies closely our national air commerce, and as a representative of the people of the State of Alaska.

We are figuratively fighting a cold war with our Russian competitors in this field of commercial air transportation, and I regret to report that it is one more area where, at the moment, we are behind them.

Our American jets started actual airline flying just 5 months ago, but the Soviets have been carrying passengers in jet airliners for almost 3 years. Only one American airline is flying our jets beyond our own borders. Its Boeing planes have made limited appearances in four European capitals, and only since last October.

The Russian jets, on the other hand have been flying to a great many European cities for more than 2 years and they are also flying regularly to the Middle East and to Asia. The Soviets are planning further extension of their jet routes to Africa and the Far East, in particular to Japan.

In addition, they are building new and even more modern airliners and will in a very short time have in service a giant prop-jet passenger plane which can carry 170 passengers 5,000 miles nonstop at a speed about equal to that of our jets, although we can match neither that range nor passenger capacity. This massive airplane has an elevator, a sky-restaurant which can seat 48 and even a motion picture theater.

The Soviets have stated publicly that they are planning a large-scale expansion of their civil air operations, in terms of added aircraft and a great extension of their already tremendous air route system. They are, of course, less interested in developing air commerce beyond their boundaries, but they are equally interested in parading their aircraft showpieces before the peoples of other nations for prestige purposes.

They are, for instance, currently negotiating for landing rights in Ghana, the newly independent republic in Africa. Whether the traffic potential justifies such a route is a moot point, but unquestionably the Soviet Union can chalk up some prestige points by showing off their jets to this nation which has not yet seen an American jet transport. The Soviets are shrewdly aware of the propaganda value of such a handsome piece of modern machinery as a jet airplane, and they are masters at exploiting it.

Let me tell you something about the Soviet civil air organization which is conducting this facet of the cold war. It is called Aeroflot, or Air Fleet. It is considerably more than an airline as we know airlines. It is in effect a cold war civil aviation force and its operating heads are two marshals of the Red air force.

Aeroflot embraces all aviation in the Soviet Union that is not military. It operates a large scale air ambulance service, which flies doctors to isolated areas and evacuates emergency cases to hospitals.

It operates an agricultural service for aerial crop dusting and seeding, pest control in swamplands, geologic surveys, and fire control.

It has its own very modern weather service.

It provides other miscellaneous services, which show that the Soviets are fully aware of the potential of aviation in their national economy. For instance, Aeroflot operates helicopters and aircraft in conjunction with the Russian fishing fleets. These planes fly out ahead of the fishing boats in search of schools of fish and radio back the best locations.

Aeroflot also has airborne cowboys, who herd cattle in the central plains by light aircraft or helicopter. From their aerial lookout posts, the "cowboys" spot the best grazing grounds for the herds, then push the cattle in those directions by "buzzing" them with the airplanes.

These are, of course, internal services which are not of particular relevance in the cold war. I mention them because I feel they illustrate how energetically the Soviets exploit all their resources to better their economy, and their overall economic status is very important to us, since their leaders have frequently challenged us to do battle in this area, rather than with weapons.

The transport operations of Aeroflot are of more importance, both from the economic and diplomatic standpoints.

A few months ago, the Soviets issued a massive document with the title "Targets for the Soviet Economy." It was a résumé of economic and production goals of the 7-year plan for 1959 through 1965.

Newsweek magazine called this report "the most comprehensive blueprint ever compiled for the destruction of capitalism and the overthrow of the United States in a global economic war."

Premier Khrushchev stated that the 7-year plan called for a sixfold increase in air transportation. Air Chief Marshal Pavel Zhigarev, who heads Aeroflot, added some of the details of the proposed economic penetration in the field of aviation. They included:

An increase of almost one-third annually in the number of passengers carried and the number of ton-miles flown;

A tremendous construction and expansion program for air facilities on the ground, with 90 major airports scheduled for construction or rebuilding and annual expenditures for improvement of service of three times what they are today;

Addition of thousands of miles of new routes, a great portion of this expansion to come outside the Soviet Union.

The marshal predicted that by 1964 the annual traffic increase would be as great as the total traffic in 1958. This means an expansion of truly staggering proportions in Soviet civil air operations—and we have learned in the last year or so that they are not given to idle boasting.

To handle this traffic growth, the Soviet aircraft industry is turning out numbers of modern turbine aircraft. This reequipment program started long before the formation of the new 7-year economic campaign. Although the Soviets do not provide too many details, it appears that their first jet transport was flying in 1955.

Named the Tupolev 104 after its designer, this plane was first shown to the Western World when it made a surprise visit to London in March 1956. It is a 70-passenger plane with speed only slightly less than that of our new jets.

The Russians used a short-cut approach to developing this jet, by using the basic design of a tested bomber. In so doing, they skipped the intermediate step of development—the four-engine propeller-driven transport.

The Tupolev 104 was placed in scheduled service in September of 1956, when our first jet was still in an early test stage. For the following 2 years, the Soviets had the only airline jet service.

During that period, the Soviets developed and started flying three other turbine planes of the propjet variety.

Today, they are readying for service two much more impressive aircraft.

One is the Tupolcv 110, a big brother to the Tupolev 104. It has four jet engines instead of the earlier version's two and can carry 100 passengers.

The giant showpiece I mentioned earlier is the Tupolev 114, also called the Roossia. It is a propjet, with four of the largest turboprop engines ever built anywhere. In addition to the extras such as the elevators and the restaurant, it has its own telephone system and private cabins for deluxe service.

This fleet of modern planes will make ideal propaganda equipment for the Reds, for each plane is a symbol of the technological capacity of the building nation.

Now, although we can do nothing about the time we have lost in this area of the prestigial battlefront, our own situation is looking up. We already have in airline service three turbine types of aircraft, the Boeings I spoke of and two propjets built by Lockheed and Fairchild.

Two more jet transports, built by Douglas and Convair, are now being test flown. They will be in airline service this year and in 1960.

Our American turbine planes are being built by the hundreds and they are scheduled for service all over the world. Under the banners of our own American-flag carriers, they will be flying into a great many foreign cities in a year or two. In addition, these American-built planes have been ordered by almost 40 foreign airlines.

Although we know that the Soviets have made some effort to interest airlines outside their boundaries in their aircraft, they have as yet made no penetration.

There is another plus on our side of the ledger. In general, our turbine planes are much bigger and faster than their Russian counterparts, with the single exception of the king-size Roossia. As symbols of American industrial capacity, they will stand up well in comparison with Soviet airline equipment.

From the economic standpoint, our airplanes are attractive to foreign buyers because they are designed and built with an eye toward making a profit for the operator. The Soviets, in their haste to develop new transports, were not able to achieve economy of operation. Their Tupolev 104, for instance, is a fuel gobbler and carries only slightly more than half as many passengers as our Boeing 707.

In their later planes, however, it appears that they have concentrated on this factor, and we cannot overlook the fact that they may become competitors for aircraft sales.

Our manufacturers of airliners employ hundreds of thousands of people and have more than 5,000 small companies supplying parts and equipment. This represents a substantial portion of our national economy and we must watch closely any Soviet attempt to influence it.

So, after a late start, we are catching up and may surpass the Soviets in this area of economic and aero-diplomatic competition. What is of concern is the next step.

Remember, the economic health of our airlines dictates the speed at which we can put new aircraft in service. These planes are not developed and bought by the Government, as is the case in the Soviet Union.

It took our airlines a long period of gradual transition from two-engine to four-engine propeller planes before they were ready for jets. They had to build up passenger volume over many years before they could afford these planes, which cost more than $5 million each.

The Soviets were able to leapfrog the intermediate steps because development and operating costs of the planes were not a factor under communistic economy.

The next step is the passenger-carrying transport which flies faster than sound, probably two or three times as fast, or between 1,300 and 2,000 miles per hour.

Fantastic as that might seem, our engineers say that we have the technological capacity to start work on such planes right now. We do not, however, have the economic capacity.

Our airlines are investing close to $3 billion in these new jets. Obviously, it will take a long period of time to pay for these aircraft, and another period before the airlines can accrue the necessary backlog to think of even faster equipment. There are so many problems connected with the introduction of our current jets, airline officials don't even want to think of tomorrow.

The Soviets are hampered by no such economic restrictions. When the designers say that such planes can be built, more than likely they will get the government go-ahead.

I need not dwell on the economic and propaganda effect of such a development. The effect on the impressionable layman, to whom our current jets are fantastic machines, would be almost as devastating to our national prestige as was the first sputnik.

In the interim, our American airlines with their jets will be carrying abroad demonstrations of the type of product a free economy can produce. They cannot fail to impress. As American civil cold war ambassadors, these free enterprise airlines with their free-enterprise planes deserve all the support we can give them.

Westinghouse Air Brake Co. Suffered in Every Segment of Business During 1958 Except in Sales to Government—Boss Complains of U.S. Spending

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a good deal of late from businessmen who seem to think that the Government of the United States is in the hands of enemies of the people, wild-eyed so-called spenders whose desire is to compel price inflation and throw the economy into ruin. From these sources, we also hear a great deal about how businessmen must get into politics to save the Nation.

An example of this attitude recently came to my attention in the form of a communication from the president of the Westinghouse Air Brake Co., of Pittsburgh, addressed to employees of that firm. This gentleman, one A. King McCord, explained why the company did less business, hired fewer people, and made less money in 1958 than in 1957.

You must not believe that Mr. McCord had the slightest feeling that anything might have been wrong with his direction of his company's affairs. Indeed not. He seemed convinced, from his letter, that everything was somebody else's fault. It was the fault of the Government—the "spenders," both Federal and State. It was the fault of wage and salaried employees who, he suggested, had somehow gained "arbitrary" increases that were "not compensated for by increased productivity." And it was the fault of the geniuses at the Department of the Treasury. Even in the present administration Mr. McCord of Westinghouse Air Brake Co. is not satisfied; he thinks that our Government's debt management policies are "improper" and that the Humphrey-Anderson long-time "tight money" policy has really been a loose policy designed to provide "cheap money."

There is a bitter irony embedded in the heart of this McCord letter, Mr. Speaker, and I shall call attention to that irony in a moment. But first let me talk about Mr. McCord's general approach.

I do not see the slightest objection to Mr. McCord's suggestion that the citizens employed by his company should interest themselves in public affairs. Indeed, that is their right, and I hope they will feel it is their duty.

We who are in political life could benefit from the participation of more and more Americans in the business of governing the country. I have been under the impression, from history books and the reports of campaign contributions, that businessmen of the status of Mr. McCord have been active in politics for many generations, but if the base can be broadened by getting other Westinghouse Air Brake employees active in public affairs, I think the country will be very much better off. All of us here are responsible to the people, and despite the theories of some, there is not a Member of this House who does not recognize his obligation to the people.

I think it no more than fair, however, to point out that Mr. McCord's idea of practical politics is to issue a set of shrill complaints about what he calls "spending" in general.

He does not say what programs he thinks the Government should abandon. He doesn't say whether he thinks we should cut off our Defense Establishment, or knock out our investment in defense highways, impacted school areas, hospitals, public health, cancer and cardiac research, services for veterans or interest on the public debt. He does not say we should destroy federally financed research that improves the chances of industry for service.

He echoes the gentlemen now in charge of the executive branch of the Government by being against "spending" in general. He adopts the political viewpoint of those whose attitude was repudiated by the people last November and calls for an attack on inflation.

Never once does he suggest, in his communication, that maybe the 6 million people left jobless or only partially employed by the recession are any responsibility of his or of the country's. He does not raise a question about the policies that have discouraged the full economic growth of this Nation in the past 6 years. He simply rails at spending.

Now let us get to the irony, Mr. Speaker. It is the cream of the jest. Mr. McCord acknowledges in his letter to his employees that the only way their company gained last year was in sales to the Government.

Westinghouse Air Brake Co. lost business from the railroads. It lost in every other section of its business, also, except in the one classification of sales to the Government.

I am not going to suggest that if Mr. McCord thinks all Government spending is terrible, it would be patriotic for him to stop bidding on Government contracts. I do suggest that it is peculiar for him to assail the policies decided upon by the elected representatives of the people, to suggest that all his troubles are due to these policies, and brag in the same letter that these policies saved his own company from larger losses in business.

To let the House read the communication to which I refer, I insert the full text of Mr. McCord's letter in the RECORD:

WESTINGHOUSE AIR BRAKE CO.,
Pittsburgh, Pa., March 6, 1959.

To All WABCO People:

The general business recession, experienced in the United States during 1958, adversely affected, in serious degree, employment by the company and profit from operations. We were hit hardest in sales to the railroad industry. Other segments of our business, except Government sales, also suffered, but not to the same degree. Government sales, and employment and earnings resulting therefrom, exceeded our 1957 experience.

Net profit per dollar of sales fell from 5.1 percent in 1957 to 4.3 percent in 1958, and total profit decreased 27.2 percent. Were it not for the diversity of WABCO products and markets and the increase in Government sales, our employment and profit experience in 1958 would have been much worse.

Nothing causes so many economic hardships to employees and business managers, or is more threatening to national security, than boom-and-bust gyrations of the national economy. Why is it not possible for overall general business to operate on a gradually ascending scale, with short leveling-out periods rather than abrupt and severe declines? The answers being given today are many and diverse and, in too many cases, are slanted because of special or selfish interest. We at WABCO have an answer—it's considered old fashioned—but we believe it has the support of most impartial economists.

Our answer is that inflation is the major contributing cause. An inflationary boom has always been followed by a bust—the bigger the boom the bigger the bust. In the process everyone is hurt—not only workers and stockholders, but all who have savings accounts and those who are living on past savings or depending on insurance or pension payments.

What causes inflation? We think we know; we believe inflation is caused by:

1. Spending by Governments—Federal and State—resulting in unbalanced budgets or taxes so high that they become a contributing inflationary force.

2. Arbitrary increases in wage rates and salaries not compensated for by increased productivity, and,

3. Improper Government debt management and interest rate policies designed to provide so-called cheap money.

If this is so—and we believe it is—what can we do, as individuals associated in a mutual enterprise, to help ourselves, our neighbors, and our country?

We can, by our own conduct, in personal budgeting and work standards, improve our lot and set an example for others to follow. We can support people in public life who are not advocates of high spending and high taxes and who do not support a cheap money policy. We can make our influence felt in our social, civic, and fraternal organizations; in our work and business associations, and in our governments. If we, if the people of America, do not do these things—then inflation is the forecast for the future bringing higher prices, higher taxes, and bigger booms and busts.

Those of us charged with managing WABCO's business are going to exert our best efforts to resist inflation. Your help in this approach—your understanding of the economic problems of today—is solicited because we know that by giving this help you will be helping yourself.

Sincerely,

A. KING MCCORD,
President.

Unemployment Compensation—Clash of Viewpoints

OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, in the Washington Post and Times Herald of April 13, 1959, a portion of the transcript of the unemployment compensation hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee quoted Mr. George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO, and me.

Since this exchange between us represents a sharp conflict in basic ideology of the role of Federal Government in our lives, I feel that my colleagues and others would be interested in the entire transcript which follows; and I believe speaks for itself:

Mr. ALGER will inquire, Mr. Meany.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Meany, I had the privilege and pleasure of reading and studying your statement last evening. I want to stick close to this statement and limit my questions to the subjects I am particularly troubled about.

On page 1 and at the top of page 5 you discuss the people who are unemployed, and the figures keep coming up of labor force compared to unemployment. Here it is 5.8 million or 7.6 percent of the labor force.

Has the AFL–CIO made a comprehensive study at any time of the constituency of this labor force that is unemployed? Specifically, how many of them are heads of families with dependents, as compared with single people or wives or seasonal workers by choice that do not have to work? Have you ever broken it down in that way? I tried with the figures I have here, and I must tell you I have some, but I am not satisfied with the figures I have.

In fairness to this entire subject, I believe this committee should have such a breakdown, and we ought to benefit from whatever you have to give us.

Mr. MEANY. Our own unions have done it; we have not done it ourselves on a national scale. However, we have a report of findings made up by a special group, by the University of Michigan. We have that report which gives some information on it.

Mr. ALGER. I am particularly interested because I see in the report that I have here—and this is available for you to study later, to give us more information on if you can—that this particular publication shows that Michigan has 37 percent of the workers that are drawing unemployment compensation at this time—and this is a typical week—did not have dependents.

That is the exception almost to the rule of the other States. In almost all of these other States 50 percent or in some cases more than 50 percent of the unemployed had no dependents. Then before this committee, the gentlemen from Arkansas, Kentucky, Indiana, Utah, and elsewhere have pointed out and additional information has been submitted to us in the record that a number of workers are of the seasonal type where there is another breadwinner in the family.

I am not saying that single workers who are only supporting themselves do not need protection. Of course, they do. But if we are trying to eliminate the greatest suffering and need, we ought to work more with the family breadwinners.

That is what is troubling me in these things.

Mr. MUNSEY. Could we have the page reference there, please?

Mr. ALGER. Yes. It is table B–12.

I am mentioning these things, Mr. Chairman, so that if the record could be left open we could benefit from the help of the legislative staffs of the AFL–CIO to add to these figures.

I certainly will study them myself as you present them to us.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Meany, if it is the thought that any additional information can be added to this record in answer to any questions, we would like to have it.

Without objection, that information will be inserted in the record.

Mr. MEANY. Yes; we will be glad to supply, to whatever extent possible, any of the statistical data that either we have available or that we can secure for you on any of these questions.

(Material not furnished reporter.)

Mr. ALGER. What percentage of unemployment would you consider to be minimum if you defined minimum unemployment as the number of people who really do not have to work or are working by choice, or possibly too lazy to work unless they get exactly what they want? I think this is important.

Mr. MEANY. You are not talking about what we call technological unemployment. You are not talking about people who are between jobs. You are talking about people who just should not figure in the working force at all. In other words, they do not need to work or they are too lazy.

During the war there was a figure came up which was one-half of 1 percent of the working force.

Mr. ALGER. I appreciate your point on that. I have a feeling from some of the material I am getting that the figure is larger than that. But again I think here is an area that needs to be explored so that we do not feel mistakenly that a certain percentage means there is heavy unemployment when actually a lot of these people are the secondary breadwinners.

Mr. MEANY. Could I say this, that, by rule of thumb or some more or less accepted theory, with the potential work force of 65 million, something under 2½ million would be considered, let us say, a normal unemployment. In other words, people between jobs and people not seeking work because they want to lay off for a while and do not need work and so on.

Mr. ALGER. That sounds fair, and certainly I want to keep that in mind.

Mr. MEANY. In other words, we never got excited when the unemployment was at that figure or below, but when it starts to go up, then we get concerned.

Mr. ALGER. To continue on in the middle of the next page, page 2, and it refers again to it on page 3, you state, "When the fundamentals are so generally accepted, when the sights of so many are fixed on the same target, why is it that year after year we continue to fall short of the mark?"

I am impressed that the States are trying to do a job and that they seem to be doing it.

We of this committee report back to the people, and so do the State legislators. As a matter of fact, the State legislators have less latitude than we do, I think. They are right there at home with their people.

Has it ever occurred to you that, good or bad, the present unemployment compensation system is what the legislators and the people themselves actually think is proper?

Mr. MEANY. I cannot buy that.

When you say the people themselves, I do not know who you mean. You are surely not speaking for the potential beneficiaries of the system.

Mr. ALGER. These legislators keep going back home and are buttonholed by their constituents, and then they are reelected or rejected, and you mention Texas on the next page of your statement, and you find fault with our system.

But you know we have to go back to our people, and justify our positions up here. Even more with the State legislators. If they have not been pleasing the people in this matter of providing unemployment compensation, I am sure the people back home would have gotten after them. Or, to put it another way, maybe the people feel the unemployment compensation system is coming along satisfactorily enough. And they do not want us to cram something down their throats.

Mr. MEANY. You realize that the State legislature is made up of people with diverse backgrounds and obligations and from various areas, and the legislators who are in a nonindustrial area do not hear from the people on this because there is no problem. The problem lies in the large urban areas where you have an industrial situation.

Mr. ALGER. We all have unemployment whether industrialized or urban, and I think all of us are troubled by it.

Mr. MEANY. I might say in my State the dice are loaded against the industrial areas by a system of representation that has existed for many, many, many years. The people in two small counties, for instance, over in the southern tier of the State of New York, from the point of view of representing people, outweigh the cities 30, 40 to 1.

Mr. ALGER. I can appreciate that, and a lot of us have been very puzzled frankly by the pattern or the path that Michigan has taken and the city of Detroit. It seems very odd to me that this heavily industrialized and heavily unionized area should be the one most in trouble.

Mr. MEANY. Your theory would be correct, I would say, if the legislators voted on the basis of numbers of people they represent affected by this law and the numbers of people they represent also who are unaffected by the law. In other words, if it was a weighted vote, if everybody had a numerical vote the same as we vote at AFL–CIO conventions, I would accept your theory that the law is what the people want it to be.

Mr. ALGER. That is a very interesting thought. In fact, I would like to paraphrase that this way:

If there are 67 million people in the work force, or whatever that total is, and 13½ million of them are unionized and use that union properly to direct their own legislative thinking and then try to effect changes in legislation, here we legislators are torn between what the entire work force of 67 million want from government in protecting labor as against what 13½ million want.

Mr. MEANY. May I submit to you that you do not know what the rest of the work force wants, and there is no one in America that can say that they speak for the rest of that work force.

The only work force that has a voice is the work force that is organized, and I challenge you to show me anything, any single little item that gives anyone the right to say that he speaks for the other 50-odd million of the work force who are not organized.

Mr. ALGER. I respect your opinion, but you are hearing my opinion, that I, as a Congressman, and my colleagues are hearing from our constituents all the time.

Mr. MEANY. But you say it is the weight of the 13½ million or the 17 million that are organized as opposed to the nonorganized work force. I say that nobody can speak for the unorganized work force because they do not speak for themselves, by the mere fact that they are not organized.

Mr. ALGER. I agree with that, but let me get back to my point.

The legislators and the Texas legislature, representing the entire constituency, which includes that percentage of the total work force that resides within the boundaries of Texas, have seen fit to set up the kind of unemployment system we have.

You can say we are wrong, and you are entitled to your opinion. But the people in Texas think that we are right.

Now, are we to completely negate what they say, at a Federal level, from 1,500 miles away, laying down the law and saying, "No. You legislators who are elected every 2 years, and you people whom they represent are wrong. We in Washington know better and feel that these Federal standards would be better for you than what you think yourselves."

That presents a dilemma, in a sense, which I think all the legislators face.

The Texas legislature sent me a resolution saying they feel that unemployment compensation should be left to the State.

Mr. MEANY. Is it not a historic fact that most of the legislators did not act until the Federal Government acted in this field?

Mr. ALGER. I think that is partly true, but I do not believe that that means the States do not have initiative. They have, but it is being taken from them.

I might say to you that when labor succeeds, if you are to succeed, in completely imposing Federal control on the States, labor itself could easily be the greatest loser. I do not think that is what you intend.

Mr. MEANY. I do not think this is so. But actually what we have here is Federal standards that are now imposed upon the States in this field, and we are pointing out from years of experience where we think these standards should be improved.

Mr. ALGER. I certainly appreciate your interest.

Mr. MEANY. We are arguing for a complete law, and certainly we do not agree there should not be any Federal standards, because the States have accepted some Federal standards, and Congress has enacted them.

We are saying, in fact, that the time has come to evaluate our experience in this field, and that the effect of Federal standards should be amended in certain respects.

Mr. ALGER. You mentioned original intent several times in your statement. While I was not so active in the original intent as certainly you were, I did listen with some interest to the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Farmer, plus men from four other States of the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Agencies who testified about how the States they represented and the organizations in which they participated, the employment security commission, I think it was, say as to how the States felt with regard to original intent.

The original intent, according to their understanding, was that are areas of decision on such things as eligibility, duration, benefit amount, and the other provisions to be made in the compensation field were to be left to the States for the reason that they were closest to the people. They know the local and State needs better than the Federal Government. So, by intent, the States were to follow that. Is that not correct?

Mr. MEANY. Yes; I think so, but now we are saying it has not worked so well, and there is a precedent for Federal standards in this field. The Labor Department can verify that, and we are saying that the law has not worked so well. We are pointing out where, and we feel that the correction can be made by improving the Federal standards.

Mr. ALGER. In the final paragraph, on page 4, Mr. Meany, you mentioned something that I think is at the heart of this, and sometimes we miss the obvious. You point out that the question of where Federal responsibility starts and where it ends is what we should be studying.

This is something that has troubled me and possibly some of the other Members of Congress. I went back to find out and I got the Employment Act of 1946. If I am not mistaken, that came about at the end of the war when people thought there was going to be large-scale unemployment. We passed the bill, and yet the unemployment did not materialize as many people thought might be the case. But there is still the law today, and if you read the language in the preamble of that particular act, every conceivable Federal regimentation or control of the work force can be justified by this language; or the labor unions as a work force, and the working people, or of all of us throughout the entire economy. It is all covered by that particular bill.

I do not know whether you recall that language, but it is all-inclusive.

Mr. MEANY. You are referring to the Full Employment Act of 1946?

Mr. ALGER. Yes.

Mr. MEANY. That is another story, and I would like to discuss that some other time.

We like the act, and we wish someone would give real effect to it.

Mr. ALGER. I just wish that this committee and the rest of Congress would study the language of that act, and think about communism, socialism and free enterprise at the time they read the act.

I submit to you that every single facet of socialism is found in that one preamble of the Full Employment Act of 1946, and I think that is some of our trouble now. Once we admit that that is the law, then there is no reason why Federal standards cannot be imposed on everything, including everything the working force does.

Mr. MEANY. The Employment Act of 1946 has contributed nothing to our problem. In fact, it has not done anything one way or the other. It has just not been implemented.

Mr. ALGER. I guess it has just contributed to my problem. It is difficult to justify. Providing jobs is not the role of government.

On page 5 you mention the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act, and the fact that it is being continued partially for another 3 months shows a recognition on the part of the Congress of a degree of Federal responsibility in this area.

I can only speak for myself on the committee, but the termination of the TUC, as far as I was concerned, showed that we did not feel that it was the responsibility of this Congress but, rather, that it should be handled another way, if even we should have had it in the first place. After all, only 17 States took advantage of it.

Mr. MEANY. But you will concede that the Congress felt that there was some responsibility when they enacted the law last year and said it would be in operation until April 1 of this year.

Mr. ALGER. Most certainly. But you are pointing out that our continuing it at this time shows our recognizing our responsibility. You are interpreting it for us quite the opposite of my own interpretations. I simply do not want that to stand.

I say I am among those who terminated it because we felt it was no longer our responsibility.

Mr. MEANY. You did not terminate it. You extended it to a degree, which we say indicates the acceptance of a degree of Federal responsibility.

Mr. ALGER. No, Mr. Meany; we did not intend to continue it, we "feathered it off" so as not to hurt those already qualified. We did not want to be unfair with the people who could qualify.

Maybe this Federal standard for unemployment compensation coming so soon after, was the reason that there was such quick agreement. I do not know, but I want you to know that that was not the entire concensus of this committee.

To move on quickly, the experience rating has been treated. I shall not dwell on that although I must tell you in fairness, after reading your statement and listening to the gentleman from Michigan who has been a fine spokesman for his viewpoint, Mr. MACHROWICZ, I am still slightly bewildered by the fact we are told you are giving a choice in this bill.

When I read the language on page 6 I think either it will result, intended or not, in destroying experience rating. I just leave it there. I realize it would be quite a debate in itself. I think we are going to have to resolve that before we are through.

Mr. MEANY. I am not going to argue that point except to say that, according to our experts—and I consider these people experts—they tell me that it does not wipe out the experience rating.

Mr. ALGER. I appreciate your statement. You did say in your statement that you did not think it was relevant. I maintain this is the one of the most relevant things in the act.

You say on the bottom of page 6 "it is not relevant to the proposals now before this committee."

I believe that experience rating is one of the most relevant things we are talking about because the whole idea of it is to preserve the incentive in the employer for stable employment, and this will make less unemployment, which is certainly desirable.

Mr. MEANY. We said it was not relevant because the bill does not wipe it out, and you disagree with that.

Mr. ALGER. On page 8 you quote the Manufacturers Association of Connecticut. This is what they say, as you quoted them:

"Our State is competing today for more markets and new industries. Hiking the cost of doing business in Connecticut is not the road to more jobs, but to less jobs."

As I read it, I do not find fault with competition because we all agree that competition is the heart of the free enterprise system, of course.

This matter of hiking costs and doing business. I wonder if study has been given this matter of purchasing power and the fact that if you hike the cost to a businessman he has got to pass it on. If he does not pass it on and collapses, then all the people he hires are unemployed and you have more unemployed. If, however, he passes on this cost to the consumer it makes higher prices of things that the entire working force of 67 million must buy, therefore limiting the purchasing power of all of them.

So on the one hand, if you unduly help provide money for those who are unemployed—it does have this effect of raising prices throughout the country—are you not hurting the very thing you would protect, and that is your purchasing power?

Mr. MEANY. You evidently have not studied the economic history of the last 50 or 60 years in this country, because actually purchasing power accompanied by increased production per man leads not to a greater cost but, in the final analysis, to a lesser cost and a wider market.

If you accept your theory, then there should never be any wage increase that is passed on to the consumer.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Meany, I have not been a student as long as you because I haven't been here as long, but I think in the time I have studied and I have tried hard to understand, that the increased productivity you mention has not accompanied the increase of prices and wages in this country, and I think that is one of our problems.

Mr. MEANY. I think statistically you can be proven wrong on that.

Mr. ALGER. If we increased the prices of these items without increasing productivity through putting additional cost on business which they pass on in higher prices, do you not then, by the very definition, cut down the purchasing power of the entire work force of this Nation?

Mr. MEANY. But the history of it shows it does not work that way.

Mr. ALGER. This is what history exactly shows, Mr. Meany.

I think you and I can agree that neither one of us has to yield to the other as to sincerity and interest in these workers.

I simply feel that is exactly what it shows, and if you can understand my concern and provide more information to me, you will help me in straightening out my thinking on this matter if that's what I need.

Mr. MEANY. We certainly can supply more information on that subject.

Frankly, we have a high price-high wage economy here in this country, and under it we have more prosperity compared to any other part of the world. I can remember when eggs were 25 cents a dozen and butter was 25 cents a pound. Of course, now they are almost three times that, but there are more people now who have the 60 and 70 cents than there were people who had the 25 cents during those days.

Mr. ALGER. That is exactly right. But that does not prove that increasing inflation necessarily solves the buying problem. We have got to have increased production to match the increased wages, else we are not accomplishing what we both want, that is, real increased purchasing power.

That study is actually in the field of the joint economic committee. I realize that, and I should not take more time on it now. But I want you to know, Mr. Meany, that unless I can have a little help solving this, you will have to recognize I might be opposed to Federal standards in all sincerity, not because I am opposed to solving the problem. As a matter of fact, I can go further and say that, based on what this committee has been told, this bill imposing Federal standards, if enacted, will actually limit purchasing power; it will create more unemployment, and therefore will accomplish what you, least of all, want to see accomplished—more unemployment and reduced purchasing power.

Mr. MEANY. I think you will concede that we do not want to cause more unemployment, we do not want to limit purchasing power.

Mr. ALGER. That is what I said. I know you do not.

Mr. MEANY. And I presume you do not want to either.

I do not question the sincerity of anyone who disagrees with me on this problem. But we certainly are prepared to try to convince you by whatever statistical data we have that we are right in our position on Federal standards.

Mr. ALGER. I know you feel that, and that is one reason I am taking the time to question it, because I am benefiting by what you are telling me.

Do you believe at this time that employees should match the employer in unemployment tax or not, to make it actually more an insurance program, since you have spoken so strongly and well for the need of preserving insurance feature as a basic principle?

Mr. MEANY. You have got me in an embarrassing position because from the very earliest days—and I took a large part in the writing of the New York State law; was a member of the commission that was set up by the Governor to study the problem before the bills were presented to the legislature—and I have always believed in employee contribution. However, some of our people do not so believe.

But you run into the problem of merit rating immediately as part of this problem.

Personally I have always felt and still feel that employees should contribute, if for no other reason than that it gives them a greater sense of responsibility for better administration of the law, and also a greater voice in improving the law on the basis of experience. But that, of course, is a case where there is a difference of opinion among labor people themselves.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Meany, I believe that there should be retained in this bill the right for the States to disqualify a worker in cases of fraud, dishonesty, or other matters. As I read the bill, unless I am wrong, it says that the State cannot disqualify.

Mr. MEANY. I don't think it says that.

Mr. ALGER. It is on page 3. Let me read it:

"Compensation shall not be denied to any eligible individual for any week of total unemployment during his benefit year by reason of exhaustion or reduction of benefit rights or cancellation of wage credit until he has been paid unemployment compensation for not less than 39 weeks during such year."

Am I misinterpreting that?

Then the next paragraph 9 restates that.

Would you be agreeable, in other words, to amending it?

Mr. MEANY. If it meant what you said I would be agreeable to that. I am not so sure it does.

Mr. ALGER. I read the exact language and am just talking about the idea now. But I am disturbed that from the States is entirely taken the right to disqualify who gets the unemployment compensation.

Mr. MEANY. I think this is subject to legal interpretation. I do not interpret it just the way you do.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the indulgence of this committee and yourself. This is the first time I have had the privilege of even meeting Mr. Meany much less questioning him on something with which I am so vitally concerned.

If I may, Mr. Meany, I want to compliment you further for what you had to say to Mr. Mikoyan and others of his type when they were here. The only thing that troubles me deeply is this—when I analyze the legislative program of the AFL–CIO that Mr. Biemiller and others send us every year and the criticism that you and the other members of the union send to us—but the criticism of legislative stands and legislative programs you ask.

I cannot determine in my thinking the difference between your program and what is honest-to-goodness socialism. If there is a difference—I am not talking just about wages, which is your field in economics, but the entire program you ask of us as Congressmen. I cannot see the difference between this total program and socialism, by basic definition. If there is a difference I would like an answer now or at any time you can give it to me.

Mr. MEANY. Let me say this. I do not know what socialism is. I have read Marx and I have read all the people who interpret him, and I still do not know what socialism is. If socialism is public ownership of the means of production, we are a little bit socialistic in this country, and we were before I was born and we have continued in that direction. In my lifetime, I have seen the means of transportation in the large cities of the country converted from private ownership to public ownership. Of course, that was always one of the things that the so-called socialists advocated.

Back in the early days of this Republic, water for instance was a medium for private profit. There were private water companies all over America. They sold water to the people. The people decided that they did not want water to be a medium of private profit. By process of legal condemnation and other processes, they put these people out of business and took that particular public service over themselves.

We hear about the socializing of the Bank of England. Our British friends claim that in 1916 America went much further in socializing banking and finance than the Britains have gone to date, when we established our Federal Reserve System. I am not an expert on that, but I am saying that is one of the charges.

If it is socialization to use public money to supply milk for school children—and of course, that charge is always made that it is socialization—then is it socialization to supply the airline companies, through the means of Federal subsidy, with an incentive to develop an airline industry, which we badly need in times of war? Was it socialization to appropriate $2 million to rehabilitate an abandoned lead mine in Colorado because the country happened to need some lead? Was it socialization when we subsidized a railroad company some years ago, when they pushed on to the Pacific coast?

I do not know, but I do know this: that during the Roosevelt administration, many things were done by the Federal Government, and very few of them that were advocated by the President under the so-called New Deal were not characterized as socialism. However, one of the officers of one of our national business organizations, according to the record, pleaded with President Roosevelt in the early days of March 1933 to take over all business at the time the banks were closed.

A few years ago I picked up, in about 1953, a brochure issued by the Central Hanover Bank of the city of New York. This is a bank which has the cream of the crop. This is a bank that is a private bank for the private fortunes of practically all of the big millionaire set in the city of New York, with a branch at 62d Street and Fifth Avenue, or somewhere close to that so-called "Gold Coast" up there. This brochure was written by some economist working for the bank, and it was distributed to the depositors of the bank. It said that there was going to be a slight recession, there was a slight recession on the way, which did come, of course, in 1954. This economist in this brochure distributed by the bank to its upper-crust customers said that they did not have to worry too much because, unlike in the thirties, we now had built-in safeguards in our economy that would prevent this thing from going too far. He pointed out what they were: unemployment insurance; that we had a reservoir of money waiting to give something to the unemployed so that they would not be totally out of the market as customers of business the day after they got unemployed. That was one of the things. The Federal deposit insurance business was another thing, under which you did not have the problem of long runs on savings banks when people got unemployed, because the Federal Government, through this deposit insurance system, insured the savings accounts of the small people. I guess it is safe to say that there is hardly a savings bank in this country that is not under that system.

He pointed out that the Securities and Exchange Commission, with its restrictions on gambling in the stock market, keeps that down.

These were the safeguards that were going to prevent us from being in real trouble in 1954 because of a slight recession. May I point out to you, Congressman, that every one of these safeguards was characterized as being socialistic at the time they were before the Congress, every single one of them.

I still do not know what socialism is, despite the things that I have read. But if socialism means that under a democratic system this republican form of government that we have, there are people who desire to secure for the great mass of the people, the workers, the wage earners, the farmers, and others, a better share of whatever wealth the economy produces, and that by providing that better share we provide a broad base of purchasing power to keep the economy moving forward—if that is socialism, then I guess I am a socialist and have been a socialist all my life. I do not figure that, but if that is what socialism means, that is the sort of thing I am interested in.

Despite my belief in the American system, despite detesting almost everything I see done in other parts of the world under the banner of socialism, I am not too concerned when I am charged with being socialistic because I advocate something that brings a little more sunlight into the lives of the great mass of the people in this country.

I submit again that the record will show that almost everything that meant a better life for the little people was attacked as socialistic. I can recall when the National Association of Manufacturers, through its State branches, was opposing the installation, the mandatory installation of dust-eliminating devices in factories where abrasive materials were being used, materials injurious to the health of the workers were permeating the air. It was demanded that there be devices in the way of small fans, and as a matter of law employers were compelled to put in these devices to protect the health of their employees. There were safeguards on the cutting tools so that there would be less chance of an employee losing a hand through some kind of a cutting device. Many of the States have these laws, but I can recall, in every one of the States where these things were advanced, the National Association of Manufacturers and its State branches opposed these things, and they opposed them on the ground that they were socialistic in nature.

So the mere characterization of some proposal as socialistic does not bother me at all. I know that I believe in this American system, and there is no other system on earth I know of or that I can read about that ever compares with it. I believe it is the best system because under this system, a little better share of the wealth that is produced by management, labor, finance, and industry gets down to the little people; and that is the thing in which I am interested.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Meany, you have done a magnificent job of telling us here how you feel, and I think you practice in your daily life what you have told us here. But I want to close by saying this in rebuttal, since I asked you the question in the first place:

Some of us with children and others with grandchildren, possibly yours, are very concerned that in this concern for little people——

Mr. MEANY. That is one thing you and I can agree upon, is grandchildren.

Mr. ALGER. There are several other things we can agree on, Mr. Meany, including providing safeguards for workers and purifying the air. In fact, I suspect you and I, in our views as opposed to foreign isms witness Mr. Mikoyan, are like two fingers on a hand. Maybe it is just that we do not get together enough to talk about it.

But I do feel this, Mr. Meany: generations yet unborn cannot vote, yet we are loading on their backs now not only taxes, if you please, but a staggering debt which they must inherit because we perpetuate what we are doing; we are not facing up to eliminating programs or paying as we go. We are passing on to future generations a staggering load.

Without discussing with you any one of these things you have mentioned, although I would love to discuss some of them with you, to try to find out where we could have drawn the line, I simply say you and your generation and now I in mine ought to do something instead of coming to Uncle Sam demanding more Federal control, more Federal expenditure. We ought to do something now to try to cut down this staggering cost.

All we are doing is coming up here and demanding more Federal programs and demanding more spending. Some of us have got to say, "No. We can't vote for that."

Why? Why not just vote for all these things?

It would be a lot easier when we got back home maybe. But it is because we are trying to cut the cost to be fiscally responsible.

If I can paraphrase everything you said, although that may not be a fair way to do it—I am oversimplifying it.

But what I think we are talking about are two ideas like this: On the one hand some believe in this country that we can all have more by sharing more equally what there is now here. On the other hand some of us believe that the only way for more of us to have more is to produce more.

I say we are not making the effort to produce more, but spending too much of our time trying to divvy up what already is here, and in the course of all this we are creating Federal centralization of power and the abridgement of personal liberty and freedom.

This is how I would like to take every one of these issues and talk about—What are we doing to a man's freedom?

Obviously when you protect him in his factory you are helping his freedom, but there are times when you are saddling generations coming on with bills and bills of debt that we are not paying for because of our nice cars and clothes and the way we think we should live today. I do not think it is right.

I have only made this little speech to you because I do not want you to think that whenever I criticize your viewpoint I am criticizing your sincerity, as some folks on your side have done to me and others. They have left the impression, when they have taken sides in this and come down to my district, since I am a zero according to labor's box score, to give me heck, saying that I am not interested in the little fellow.

I do not know who the "little people" are. Down in my country everybody thinks he is as big as he wants to be.

But whoever they are I am just as interested in feeding and clothing the poor as anyone. But I do not want to subsidize goldbricks or those who want to sit on their rockers and draw as much money as they can through almost a guaranteed annual wage proposition.

Some of the people coming in here representing the AFL–CIO seem to feel that we ought to give a man a guaranteed annual wage under unemployment compensation for doing nothing.

To close, I simply say to you that it looks to me in this bill like we are trying to do two things that this bill is not intended to do: On the one hand we are treating it as relief or welfare, and on the other hand we are faced with the stark realization there must be more jobs. That is what you want, and more jobs are not provided by the unemployment compensation bill. What we are doing is treating the result of the sickness in this bill and not the cause of one sickness itself.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I surely appreciate your forbearance.

Contrasting Political Philosophies

OF

HON. THOMAS M. PELLY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, families living in the United States who were on moderate and fixed incomes suffered great hardship due to rising prices and the cost of food, shelter and clothing from 1939 to 1952 when, except for the 80th Congress, control of both the legislative and the executive branches of the Federal Government was in the hands of the Democrats.

On March 9, 1959, the House-Senate Joint Economic Committee issued its 12th annual review of the President's Economic Report and the budget. The 10 Democrats on this committee must have forgotten about what happened during those previous years because in their views on the review they charge the present Republican administration policies reflect too much concern with price rises. Committee Republicans reject that criticism, as do, I am sure, all lower income persons who have experienced the effects of a shrinking buying power of the dollar.

Very rightly, it seems to me, an administration must concern itself from day to day and month to month with the threat of the possible diminishing value of the dollar and a resultant rise in the cost of living. The time to give attention to such a situation is before any such drop in the value of the consumer dollar occurs—not afterward when counteraction is too late.

Let us remember that prior to 1952 under Democratic administrations, the cost of living rocketed some 90 percent, shrinking the value of wages and true income to about 52 cents. A $1,000 laid away in a savings account in 1939 for a rainy day as a result shrank to about $520 by 1952.

Let us not forget either another thing which added to the economic plight of the wage earner during this same period. In addition to the cut in income dollars of nearly one-half, due to lower value of the dollar, his burden of taxes was increased. Between 1939 and 1952. lower income groups were drastically hurt by the Democratic Congress through a reduced personal income tax exemption from $2,500 to $1,000 for a married couple, and from $1,000 to $500 for a single worker.

On top of this, adding to a worker's woes, the Democrats increased the minimum rate of taxation from 4 percent on the first $4,000 of income to 23 percent on the first $2,000 of income.

This is the record as to the treatment of lower income workers and retired persons.

Furthermore, only once during those years was there a tax reduction—that occurred in 1948 when the Republican 80th Congress, over the veto of a Democratic President, increased exemptions and reduced the minimum income tax rate.

Of course, the New Deal-Fair Deal philosophy of economics embraces bigger taxes and more spending. The Democrat Party in its basic principle has been consistent in this respect over the past 27 years. It is still the party of high taxes and a shrinking dollar. The Democratic Advisory Council goes further and advocates keeping Federal spending of borrowed, deficit dollars as a vital factor to a growing national economy.

Not all Democrat legislators believe in Federal Government controls and big spending. Many Democrats oppose the welfare state idea, but these are out of step with the program of the majority party of the Congress. The outstanding Democratic savers, economizers, and those who consistently represent a basic ideology contrary to their own party leadership, of course, are entitled to full credit as individuals. However, under our political system it is the party that offers a program and, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the record is clear that between the two political philosophies it is the Republicans who favor low taxes and seek to protect the economy of the consumer.

American Diplomacy in Sports

OF

HON. JOHN V. LINDSAY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, about 2 weeks ago a plane touched down at La Guardia Airport bringing back from Paris an important American diplomatic mission. The leading member of the mission did not wear striped pants or carry a briefcase. In fact, the leader of this good-will group was a lovely young lady. She had spent 10 days in the important European capitals involved in the present tense situation, but she had not appeared at a conference table or in front of a lecture during her tour. In Berlin, in Paris, in Geneva, she had gone directly to the people with a simple message of human understanding and light and hope from the United States. Her name is Carol E. Heiss. She is the world ladies' figure skating champion.

I do not mean to treat the present difficult world situation lightly when I speak of Carol as an instrument of American diplomacy. This young lady, who represents the best of the spirit and skill of amateur sport, speaks to the people of the world in a common language of art and athletic skill that can help to bridge the gap built by misunderstanding between the citizens of different countries. Along with other amateur athletes who take part in trips and exhibition tours to other countries, she helps to prove that the interests that unite people throughout the world will prove, in the end, stronger than the interests that divide them. And at the same time, by developing habits of mind for peaceful competition and fair play, great athletes like Carol Heiss bring to life the famous words: "On the playing fields of our land are sown the seeds that, on other fields, on other days, will bear the fruits of victory."

There are a number of reasons that ice skating and Carol Heiss should be specially chosen as a model diplomatic courier for our Nation. One of them is that skating is a universal sport, not only because its techniques and rules spread uniformly to all countries, including those behind the Iron Curtain, but because it is a sport which can be participated in and enjoyed by persons of all ages and all classes. It is a sport where the premium is on the difficult virtues of patience, control, consistency, and sportsmanship. I speak from experience, because my own tentative attempts to figure skate have taught me both the perils and pleasures of the sport. I also have had the pleasure of knowing Carol Heiss and have admired her not only for her achievement but for her unassuming charm and warmth of character.

Ice skating offers the attraction of speaking in the same language in any country, and Carol Heiss holds unchallenged sway as its leading interpreter. Those who have seen her skate never forget the soaring mastery, the perfect precision of her performances. All this has come from patience and dogged determination, the two great requirements of any athlete. She has fought her way to this pinnacle of art and skill against great odds. Born the daughter of a baker in New York City, she and her family have known the sacrifices which are necessary to train the raw skill of a little girl into the grace of a champion. For 12 years, 5:30 in the morning has meant rising time for Carol; and even as champion, she spends 4 or more hours a day on the ice, both to maintain her rank and to help improve the technique and art of the sport for future champions. After years of this regimen of work, when only 16, she captured the coveted world figure-skating title in 1956, at Garmisch-Partenkirchen in Germany, and she has successfully defended it three times since. In Colorado Springs, Colo., in February of this year, she outskated all the competition again to secure her fourth world crown.

Only one new laurel still remains open to Carol, and it is the symbol of world brotherhood through sport that she embodies so well. The five linked rings of the Olympic games will fly from a flag at Squaw Valley, Calif., just a year from now. At the Olympic Village, athletes of all nations, from East and West, from the farthest reaches of Scandinavia to the villages of Africa, white, black, brown, and yellow, will meet together to speak through strength, skill, and beauty universal language that always unites man. Among those athletes will be skaters from many lands, who will give Carol battle for the prize that every champion hopes for. This will be the great test of her diplomatic skill, and of her ability to carry this country's message, through herself, and her skates, from a humble home in America to all the world. We wish Carol good luck on this most difficult mission.

The Appeal of U.N. "Presence" in Berlin

OF

HON. CHARLES O. PORTER

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a copy of a press release from my office, dated April 10, 1959, and a feature story by William R. Frye in the Washington, D.C., Sunday Star, April 12, 1959.

PRESS RELEASE, APRIL 10, 1959, FROM THE OFFICE OF REPRESENTATIVE CHARLES O. PORTER, WASHINGTON, D.C.

The U.S. Department of State has commented officially on the proposal by Members of the U.S. House of Representatives and the British Parliament that the whole of Berlin should come under United Nations responsibility.

In a letter dated April 9, 1959, addressed to Representative CHARLES O. PORTER, Democrat of Oregon, the Department of State termed the proposal "among the most carefully thought out of the various proposals on this subject which have been brought to the Department's attention" and said that it "has a very definite appeal."

The resolution was sent to the Department for comment by Representative PORTER on March 31. He conferred with members of the Parliament when he was in London about 2 weeks ago.

Answering for the Department of State, Assistant Secretary William B. Macomber, Jr., said the joint British-American proposal would be given serious study. In his letter to PORTER, he said:

"While the idea of United Nations action has a very definite appeal, the specific proposals generally overlook two important factors of the Berlin situation. The first of these is the special responsibility which the United States, the United Kingdom, France, and the Soviet Union bear for Germany as a whole and for Berlin. This responsibility is based on the Four Powers' occupation of Germany and upon the agreements which they concluded among one another during and after World War II. The problem which has arisen with regard to Berlin has its origin in an attempt on the part of the Soviet Union to evade its obligations under those agreements, notably the obligation to restore German unity in peace and freedom. The second factor usually overlooked in proposals for United Nations action is the danger of attempting to deal with the Berlin question in isolation. A real and lasting solution to the problem of Berlin can be found only in German reunification, and it is the Department's view that primary emphasis should be put on making progress toward a resolution of the larger underlying problem rather than on interim or palliative measures to deal with the lesser problem."

PORTER said he had hoped the Berlin proposal would be considered at the Foreign Ministers' meeting "along with other proposals." He said he was not ruling out such action.

Among the six British Members of Parliament signing the proposal was Clement Attlee, former Labor Prime Minister.

Signing the original proposal in this country were 10 House Democrats: STEVEN V. CARTER (Iowa), FRANK M. CLARK (Pennsylvania). BYRON L. JOHNSON (Colorado), WILLIAM H. MEYER (Vermont), CLEM MILLER (California), CHARLES O. PORTER (Oregon), HENRY S. REUSS (Wisconsin), GEORGE M. RHODES (Pennsylvania), RALPH J. RIVERS, (Alaska), and LEONARD G. WOLF (Iowa).

Other House Members indicated interest in the resolution. One of them, Representative CHESTER BOWLES, Democrat, Connecticut, wrote PORTER Thursday, "I agree that the suggestion for a United Nations force in Berlin is a constructive and meritorious one. I have felt all along that if there was some way to involve the U.N. more directly with the Berlin controversy, it would be helpful."

USE OF U.N. PRESENCE ADVANCED AS A SOLUTION TO BERLIN PROBLEM

(By William R. Frye)

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.—To one who has just returned from 6 weeks in the Middle East, talk of a United Nations presence in and about Berlin has a familiar ring.

The U.N. has established its presence in the Middle East in a variety of forms, ranging from one man (Pier P. Spinelli) with a small staff in Amman, Jordan, to a 5,000-man army in the Gaza Strip.

The U.N. is present on Israel's borders in the form of a small corps of observers (the Truce Supervision Organization). The U.N. came and went in Lebanon as a very different kind of observer team.

Exactly how the idea could be borrowed for Berlin, and in what form, is by no means easy to foresee. It depends in large part, of course, on Soviet Premier Khrushchev.

A good deal of preliminary thinking and planning has been done, however, on the Western side—notably by the Canadians, who are credited with the original proposal, and by Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold, who has just come back from Moscow. Some of the thinking is still secret; some can be reported.

HOW IT MIGHT BE DONE

The starting point is that no conceivable U.N. army could be mustered to hold open the approaches to Berlin by force. Even if it did not have to clash directly with the 350,000-man Soviet occupation force in East Germany, it would still have an East German Army of some 200,000 men to deal with.

A military operation on this scale, against organized opposition, is well beyond the U.N.'s capacity. It would require, in practice, the deputizing of NATO forces to act on behalf of the U.N.—something the Security Council could not do, because of the Soviet veto, and the General Assembly would not do, out of fear of world war.

The U.N.'s role, therefore, would be that of executing, or supervising the execution, of a plan agreed upon by the great powers.

If the Big Four were to agree to make West Berlin a free city under international auspices, the U.N. could provide the government, and Western occupation troops could be called U.N. troops. The U.N. has never done this kind of job—governing a city—but was prepared to do so both in Trieste and in Gaza until events removed the necessity.

If a summit conference were to agree upon a new formula for Western access to Berlin, giving East Germans some or all of the functions now exercised by Russians, U.N. observers of the TSO type could be stationed along the route to see that there was no interference.

ANALOGY IN MIDDLE EAST

The analogy perhaps is not auspicious, but the TSO does this kind of thing now in relation to Mount Scopus, the Israeli enclave inside Jordanian territory in Old Jerusalem, next to the Mount of Olives. TSO observers check cargo manifests and try to make certain Jordan does not interfere with legitimate Israeli convoys.

There has been intermittent trouble despite the TSO's efforts, but no one doubts that it would have been much worse without the U.N. on hand.

If the East Germans must check Western convoys to Berlin—and Khrushchev seems inflexible on this point—the West obviously would rather have the U.N. there than leave the job wholly to the Germans.

There should be no illusions about the extent of the U.N.'s potential authority. It would not have power to compel the East Germans to do or not to do anything. It does not have that power today in the Middle East. The U.N. is not a super government.

If Khrushchev (and the East Germans) would let the U.N. actually man the checkposts, it would be a different matter. But preliminary soundings in Moscow appear to rule out that idea. Possibly—just possibly—the point can be negotiated.

In practice, however, the best attainable solution probably will be one in which the U.N. role would be that of a troubleshooter who would observe the checkposts, investigate complaints, iron out genuine misunderstandings, and publicize willful violations, depending on the pressure of world opinion in the latter case to provide the necessary sanction.

From the point of view of real politik, this would mean that if the West were forced to ram its convoys through to Berlin by force, the moral justification for such action would have been established in advance by an authority few would challenge.

All this, of course, is in the realm of preliminary thinking and planning. There are those within NATO who resist the whole idea.

Why, they ask, should the West purchase from Khrushchev at the price of a considerable contribution to the stability of Communist East Germany—including its de facto recognition by the U.N.—a set of rights and privileges which should belong to the West in any event? There should not, of course, be any challenge to the West's position in Berlin. A U.N. role should not be necessary.

Those who argue in favor of the purchase contend that, like it or not, the West's position in Berlin has been challenged. That position, they say, cannot be maintained by force without unacceptable risk of world war. A segment of NATO is unwilling to face up to that risk.

This preliminary question—whether to accept any change in the status of Berlin—will obviously have to be settled before the West dickers with Khrushchev over the nature and functions of a U.N. presence there.

A FACE-SAVING DEVICE

If, however, the ultimate decision is to buy off the threat to Berlin at the lowest price available—and Chancellor Adenauer's sudden decision to give up the reins of power in Bonn suggests that it probably will be—then use of the U.N. should be an excellent face-saving device.

A U.N. regime in and about Berlin need not look like a diplomatic defeat; it might not even be one. It would not be a defeat if the West, as part of the same package, got from Russia compensatory advantages, say in the field of inspection and arms control.

For maximum face saving, U.N. people believe the negotiations at one stage or another should become, in fact or in appearance, U.N. deliberations. They should take place, it is argued, under a U.N. roof.

This is why there is private urging that the summit conference be held at U.N. headquarters—or if this is not considered feasible, then elsewhere, but still as a meeting of the U.N. with heads of state acting as U.N. delegates. The agreement then would partake the moral aura of a U.N. decision.

A U.N. presence is not an automatic cure-all. UNEF is generally credited with being a success; the TSO is helpful, but by no means wholly effective. Spinelli has practically nothing to do, which perhaps means he is a success. UNOGIL was very nearly a flop, because it was put into an impossible position without adequate tools to do the job.

In Berlin, given a reasonable chance, U.N. people believe a presence could be the smoothest way out of a very deep hole.

The Extreme Urgency of a Realistic Urban Renewal Program

OF

HON. TORBERT H. MACDONALD

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, we will soon be considering on the House floor the housing and urban renewal bill, which is designed to assist local governments to eliminate slums, eradicate blight, and to renew our Nation's cities.

No thinking person can deny that the United States has progressed from a rural to an urban Nation at a phenominal rate of speed. Even with our suburbias we are still essentially a nation of city dwellers. I do not intend to review all of the facets of urban expansion today, but I do want to emphasize the need for a vast and realistic program of urban renewal.

The two substantial factors in this expansion process have been, first, population growth; and second, the migration of population and industry. The problems created by this growth and resettlement are of a scope which could not be predicted by even the most expert of population analysts. New industries, urban sprawl, and highways have diminished available space. Substandard residential areas are becoming more and more prevalent in our suburbs, our larger cities, and our smaller townships. In this, the space age, we cannot afford to develop an age of less space, nor can we condone less than the highest attainable economic use of all available space.

A recent editorial appearing in a Washington newspaper warned against the apparent indifference to the gobbling up of our great open spaces in the face of a growing population which bids fair to reach 200 million in less than 10 years hence. The editorial noted:

> The simple fact is that the country cannot absorb 25 million additional inhabitants every 8 years without careful planning on the one hand or chaotic consequences on the other.

Recent history should make it clear to all concerned that efficient planning, rural and urban, is a must if we are to save our blighted cities, and preserve our rich farmlands and other natural resources and create desirable future cities. Time and again we have read and heard the warnings against the creation of rural slums and against haphazard growth of large cities. We must furnish our communities with every possible tool for orderly development and necessary redevelopment.

The Housing Act of 1959 which will soon be before us contains many of these needed tools. This act consists of provisions for several programs which are aimed at stimulating home construction—public and private—and the improvement of housing standards, chief among these are proposals for expanded and continued urban renewal aids. It is for these vital urban renewal tools that I am urging your support today. Through this program we have helped cities to help themselves, by clearing slums, by removing blight, and preventing further deterioration. Only through an adequate, continuing program of Federal aid can we help meet the needs of the cities and townships of the Nation in their efforts to halt blight; and only through planning can we hope to prevent a recurrence of the run-down conditions which currently necessitate such a program.

The House bill also provides for an effective housing program to meet the special housing needs of our senior citizens. Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the first housing project—Highland Gardens Apartments—for elderly persons in the United States under the Federal program was constructed last year in Somerville, Mass., which is a part of my Eighth Congressional District. The success of this project proves that we need more of this type of housing. I am, therefore, very pleased that the House bill provides for a new program designed to provide rental housing for elderly persons at rentals which they can afford.

There are those who argue that urban renewal is not a problem of the Federal Government, that it is a local problem, to be solved by local government and local private enterprise. I am in complete agreement with this. The Federal program under title I of the 1949 Housing Act is based upon this very premise. Urban renewal programs are initiated, planned and executed locally. The Federal Government shares the cost of the project—that is, the difference between the cost of the cleared land and the price offered by the developers. This sharing with the local government is on a two-thirds Federal, one-third local basis. Each step taken by the local government is subject to Federal approval based upon the proper and efficient operation of the basic law. I am sure we are all agreed that in any instance in which Federal aid is granted, an accounting of the use of funds is not only necessary, but desirable. I do not agree, however, that the Federal Government should not render assistance.

It is obvious that the local units do, and should, bear the brunt of the responsibility for planning and execution of urban renewal projects. But, this does not mean that it is solely a local problem. Urban renewal and redevelopment, the clearance of slums, are undeniably and clearly a part of a national problem to provide a decent home and suitable living environment for each and every American family. Urban renewal will play a large part in stemming the rise of juvenile delinquency. Federal urban renewal aids are investments in better families, better citizens and better communities. These are investments which will return dividends in higher national income, and increased sources of revenue for local, State and Federal Governments. These are investments which, if neglected, can result in economic and social retrogression in place of progress.

Currently, the urban renewal program is moving along at a reasonably rapid pace. Testimony at hearings of the Committees on Banking and Currency, and other published data have revealed that one of the reasons for some of the lack of interest in this field was that many communities were reluctant to launch into the projects because they were afraid that Federal aid would not remain available. Cities were acutely aware of the need for renewal and the prevention of further deterioration, but they did not feel that such a financial venture was within their means. Since the program has taken on an air of permanency, more and more communities, large and small, have availed themselves of the various aids which are a part of the Federal urban renewal program. Should the Congress fail in providing a well-rounded, fully adequate program for the next several years to come we will be sorely remiss in our duty to maintain economic stability.

Albert M. Cole, former Housing Administrator, predicted in 1958 that "any city that does not set in motion by 1960 a comprehensive program to halt blight will be flirting with municipal ruin by 1965." Now is the time to guard against municipal ruin by 1965, 1975, or 25 years hence. Now is the time for the Federal Government, through the Congress, to provide our municipalities with the necessary financial and planning guidance which will assist them in their fight against decay and deterioration and help them in the provision of healthy, sound communities. We cannot afford a lapse in our support of this worthwhile program such as occurred in the failure to pass a Housing Act of 1958. The 85th Congress was the first Congress in several years not to rally to the support of our communities in their war against stagnation and retrogression. We cannot let this happen in the 86th Congress. I for one, shall do everything in my power to see that a meaningful urban renewal program is forthcoming.

What would constitute such a program? First, and foremost, the urban renewal authorization must be adequate to assure the continuation of the urban renewal program at a sufficiently high level to avoid any curtailment or postponement of urban renewal projects contemplated. In addition, it must not bar the applications of cities which for one reason or another, have not completely set in motion their urban renewal plans. It would seem to me that an adequate measure could be no less than the program provided by the house bill. This bill provides for a total authorization of approximately $2.1 billion. Under this bill $500 million would be available for urban renewal grants in each of the next 3 years. It would also increase relocation payments to relieve the hardship suffered by families and businesses displaced from urban renewal areas by government activity. An additional $10 million would also be provided for urban planning grants. Under this bill all communities would be provided with incentive to move forward with needed projects. Under this bill the Federal Government, the local government, and local private enterprise could work together, cooperatively, to assure all citizens a livable home in desirable surroundings. Under this bill, some of our unemployment problems will be erased through an increase in construction volume. Under this bill, we could assure healthy national, State, and local economies. Realistic Federal urban renewal will preserve tax values, stimulate private industry and thereby increase our tax returns.

Mr. Speaker, if a program of this magnitude is enacted into law it will provide hundreds of communities across the Nation, including my Eighth Congressional District of Massachusetts, with reasonable assurance of the availability of adequate funds so that the urban renewal program will continue to be carried out. This program, it seems to me, is one that we all should promote as having the highest priority of a forward looking program for the benefit of all the United States.

Secretary Benson's Speech in Dallas

OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include Secretary Benson's speech in Dallas before the 50th annual convention of Texas Cotton Ginners' Association, April 7, 1959:

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE EZRA TAFT BENSON AT 50TH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF TEXAS COTTON GINNERS' ASSOCIATION, DALLAS, TEX., APRIL 7, 1959

I am delighted to join you in this 50th annual convention of the Texas Cotton Ginners' Association. This, I understand, is the largest meeting of its kind anywhere in the United States. It is both a signal honor and a challenging responsibility to have the opportunity to meet with so many representatives of the entire cotton industry.

And, may I add, your Texas welcome leaves nothing to be desired. There is an old saying, "The glory of the house is hospitality." Hospitality is also one of the glories of the people of this great State.

But I did not come here simply to sing the praises of Texas. My mission is to talk frankly with you about agriculture in general and cotton in particular.

The facts indicate that 1958 was a year of substantial improvement for most U.S. farmers.

The per capita income of our farm people, from all sources, rose 10½ percent to $1,068. This was a new high. It was 9 percent above the previous record of $983 in 1951—a war year.

The fact is that the per capita income of our farm people had a more favorable relationship to the income of nonfarm people last year than it did in 1952—the year before this administration took office.

Farm operators' realized net income rose to $13.1 billion in 1958. This was the highest in 5 years. The gain over 1957 was $2.2 billion, or 20 percent.

Prices received for farm products averaged 6 percent above 1957 and were the highest since 1953.

The value of farm assets, the proportion of farms owned by their operators, and the standard of living of farm families were all higher in 1958 than ever before.

The total assets of U.S. agriculture at the beginning of this year reached $200 billion. Farmers' net equities, after all debts, were $177.4 billion. This was a gain in equities of about $11 billion over a year earlier, and a gain of $134 billion since 1940.

This is not to say, however, that agriculture's major difficulties have all been solved. Far from it. We still have surpluses of some crops. The cost-price squeeze is still pinching our farm people. We still have many underemployed, low-income farm families. A few crops are still under programs which are outmoded, too costly, discriminatory and harmful to agriculture as a whole. The President's message of January 29 clearly showed the need for prompt action in this regard.

Now, what about cotton? Here, too, the situation is not all that we would like—but assuredly it is better by far than it was a couple of years ago. You will recall that the cotton carryover in mid-1956 was at a tremendous record high of 14.5 million bales.

Since then, largely through the vast subsidized export program, supplemented by acreage reductions, the carryover has been reduced by 40 percent. It stood at about 8.7 million bales as of August 1958. It will be at about that same level next August. Although still burdensome, this is the smallest carryover since 1953–54.

Domestic consumption of cotton is picking up beyond previous estimates. Business conditions are generally good, and that favorable fact is being reflected in increased mill use of cotton. If the current rate of consumption is maintained, we will use about 8.5 million bales here at home this marketing year. That would be a substantial gain over last year and the year before.

I wish I could say the same for exports. At present, it looks as though about 3 million bales will be exported this year. Thus, total disappearance will be about the same as the 1958 production.

Now, I don't want to get into a second guessing contest with anyone. But I do object strongly to the mistaken notion that the Department of Agriculture has been, or is, dragging its feet on the cotton export program.

Let's look at the facts. Since the beginning of the 1956–57 marketing year, and through this marketing year, our cotton exports will total about 16.5 million bales. This is an average of over 5 million bales a year. I recall quite clearly that in testimony and debate at the time the export legislation was discussed, 4.5 to 5 million bales was then regarded as a "fair historical share of the world market" for U.S. cotton. Of course, this estimated share is not a static figure. It may vary up or down from one time to another.

I want to say with all the earnestness at my command that I will continue to seek a fair share for American cotton, whatever that share may be.

During the 1956–57 marketing year we exported 7.6 million bales of cotton, the highest since 1933.

In 1957–58 we exported 5.7 million bales.

The total of more than 13 million bales in the 2 years was an outstanding record of successful, competitive exports—far above the expectations of many cotton men.

Cotton exports could not be expected to continue at these high levels. Foreign stocks, which had been low, were built up to high levels. This is one reason why our exports during the current marketing year have fallen off. But the record shows that our export programs have been effective. They have moved a lot of cotton in the interests of the American cotton grower and in line with the expressed wish of the Congress.

I do not believe, however, that the cotton export program is a permanent solution. We must seek markets on a sound competitive basis through normal market channels.

We must not lose sight of the fact that we have moved this cotton under the subsidy program at a substantial cost to U.S. taxpayers. It will continue to be expensive to do this.

The export subsidy rate which we have announced for the beginning of the next marketing year will be about $40 per bale exported. To this cost must be added that of the difference between the purchase price for choice A cotton and the resale price for unrestricted use. After taking into consideration the administrative expenses, this phase of our subsidy operations will result in a cost of about $20 per bale. This means that on the choice A cotton which is exported the subsidy will cost taxpayers $60 a bale.

No matter how you figure it, this adjustment to meet competitive world prices will be costly. Why? Because of the long continued use of unsound programs.

Textile activity both at home and abroad is picking up. This upsurge should reach substantial proportions in the coming marketing year.

The new cotton law, with which you are all familiar, should help producers and the entire cotton industry. It is designed to provide more freedom to plant, to market, to compete, and to make decisions.

A total of about 69,000 farm operators have elected the choice B upland cotton program for their farms for 1959. Allotments for these farms are thereby increased from a total of 2.5 million acres to 3.6 million acres.

I imagine one of the questions uppermost in your minds is how the Department is going to operate its purchase and sale of choice A cotton. Although we have not yet announced all of the details, we are currently planning to operate somewhat along the same lines as the loan program. Purchases and sales will be made through local people.

This would mean that qualified persons or firms—ginners, banks, cotton buyers, cotton merchants, cotton cooperatives, or warehousemen—would be permitted to enter into agreements with the Government and act as agencies for the purchase of choice A cotton from local producers. An approved purchasing agency could be approved as a sales agency to sell choice A cotton locally.

I must stress that this is not final. Many details still have to be settled. But I assure you that we adhere firmly to the principle of making maximum use of private trade channels. That has been our philosophy from the beginning. We hold to it strongly.

Another question you want answered is, When are we going to start? We expect to have the purchase program out in time to take care of your early crop areas. The sales program details may take a little longer, but they will be ready before the August 1 beginning of the new crop year. Sales of cotton under the provisions of the new program cannot begin until then.

It is my belief that the Agricultural Act of 1958 as it applies to cotton can help this great industry move toward expanded markets at home and abroad.

On the other hand, it is by no means a complete solution to our cotton problems. Over the past 20 or 25 years the cotton industry has become involved in a complex—almost bewildering—situation which is by no means easy to unscramble.

My complaint about the old cotton program is simply this: Over the years it was loaded down with so many conflicting gadgets that it became wholly unworkable.

The price-support mechanism was frozen at a production-incentive but market-destroying level. Markets were handed to synthetics on a silver platter. We have spent 6 years trying to thaw out the system, and the job isn't finished yet.

In addition, over the years special fringe benefits, such as the ⅞ Middling provision, were provided, which had the effect through 1954 of making the actual support level even higher than the unrealistic 90 percent of parity.

On the other hand, a number of special provisions, plus the technological revolution, made acreage controls almost ridiculously ineffective.

All this added up to a classic example of trying to have your cake and eat it too. It just can't be done—not for cotton or any other commodity.

The effects of such contradictory policies are even more evident in the case of wheat. Despite the control programs, we now have by far the greatest wheat surplus in all history.

By July 1960 the carryover of wheat will be about 1½ billion bushels—enough to supply our normal domestic requirements 2½ years. We will have $3½ billion tied up in wheat alone.

We have spread the Wheat Belt all over America. Wheat acreage has increased in areas of high cost, while acres have been cut back in areas where production is most efficient. This doesn't make sense.

Not only have surpluses of a few crops piled up, the cost of the price-support program is staggering—indefensible.

Our total investment in price-supported commodities is now $9 billion. It will probably exceed $10 billion by the end of the next fiscal year.

It is estimated that during the next fiscal year we will spend more than $1 billion—$1 billion—just for storage, transportation, and interest on these Government-held surpluses.

It is apparently impossible for a Secretary of Agriculture to deal effectively with the present critical problems of agriculture always on the basis of just necessity or just economics—he must sometimes face up to the politics.

There is nothing disgraceful in the word politics or in the word "politician." Politics is the art of government and good politics makes for good government. The very foundation of this Government was a document divinely inspired that was drafted and adroitly handled by politically educated men to become an instrument for freedom. What we must strive for in the political factor of the formula is to have political action governed by the economic facts. And this is where the failures have occurred.

I think it must be admitted that in the past there has been an overemphasis on political approaches to farm problems which are basically economic.

Agriculture must not be sacrificed on the political auction block. Agriculture is neither Republican nor Democrat. It is American.

Let us be candid. Both major parties share responsibility for the situation in which we now find ourselves. But more important is the responsibility for getting to the solution. Congress has our recommendations. It is my sincere hope that the action so urgently needed will be taken without further delay.

No one has more concern than I about the cost of these farm programs. This Secretary of Agriculture has been administering, and is still required to administer, within the straitjacket of outmoded laws, the most costly, irrational, hodgepodge program ever patched together. It is the result of 25 years of political attempts to solve economic problems, seemingly with an assiduous determination to pretend that economics does not exist.

Do you think that as a farmer, the son of a farmer, yes, the grandson of a farmer, and as a former county agent, and now as a spokesman for farmers, I enjoy for one minute the distinction of administering the third largest item in the Federal budget? Of course not.

But be assured, I would not hesitate to defend this program if it were serving the best interests of our farm families and the people of the Nation. The truth of the matter is that these stupendous surpluses and heavy costs are not only sapping the vitals of free agriculture, they are also a threat to the solvency of this Nation.

The Secretary of Agriculture is subject to many pressures and crossfires. Opposition to change—to sound economic solutions to economic problems—has been almost unbelievable. My opponents can't agree on a constructive solution of the farm dilemma. Really, the only general agreement among my opponents is this:

"Let's saddle Benson with all of the ills of agriculture, and especially with the cost of the mess we helped cook up for him."

With smoke screens of distortions and half-truths, those who would dodge responsibility for obvious failures seek to obliterate the facts. But a rising crest of informed and aroused public opinion is beginning to penetrate the fog of confusion.

One of the largest national farm magazines recently invited farmers to tell Congress what to do about price-support programs.

In replying to that poll, 55 percent voted for "no supports, no controls, no floors, free market prices; get the Government clear out."

This is a significant increase over the 50 percent who in a similar poll a year ago favored getting the Government out of farming.

Another 15 percent favored emergency supports only "to prevent disaster from a huge crop or sudden loss of markets; floors set at, say 50 percent of parity, or 75 percent of the average 3-year market price and no production controls."

Another 8 percent wanted adjustment supports "such as 90 percent of the average 3-year market price, permitting gradual adjustment to normal markets and moderate production control when necessary to ease adjustments."

Only 22 percent wanted more Government price help. This breaks down into 14 percent who favor a return to supports at 90 percent of parity or more and 8 percent who asked for production payments.

This nationwide poll showed that 8 out of 10 of the farmers want greater freedom and less Government in farming. In the South the figures are 81 percent for more freedom in farming as against 19 percent for more Government in farming.

Yes; the voice of the American farmer calls in louder and louder tones for more freedom to act, and less Government interference.

If this is what farmers want what are we waiting for—what is Congress waiting for? I repeat, we've made our recommendations. Why don't they act?

In January, the President again asked the Congress to make forthright changes in our farm price supports. He urged that price supports no longer be related to a standard 45 years old, but to a percentage of the average market price during the immediately preceding years.

If the Congress still prefers to keep existing parity standards, the President urged that the Secretary be given discretion to establish the support level for all commodities in accordance with guidelines fixed by law. This is now permitted for all of the 250 commercially produced commodities except the 16 for which supports are mandatory.

Either of these changes would be constructive. Under either course, the surplus could be reduced, the cost cut, production controls relaxed, and markets developed. Our farm people could make more of their own decisions. The Government could resume its proper function of promoting farm research, expanding and developing markets, protecting soil and water resources, improving farm credit, and so on. We would help stabilize markets, not price ourselves out of them.

Congress recognized the need for farm program revision last year by passing the Agricultural Act of 1958. This act made some limited changes in the program for corn, cotton, and rice. Now we need prompt and effective action in behalf of producers of the other three basic crops, wheat, tobacco, and peanuts.

The American people want and deserve a program that makes sense. The poll I referred to is one further evidence that most of our farmers want it, too.

Our old costly farm programs are not only harmful to agriculture, they also contribute to unbalancing the budget—and this adds to the threat of inflation. That is of utmost concern to every citizen. No nation can go on indefinitely living beyond its income and cheapening the value of its currency.

I am intensely concerned about this. The course of inflation is subtle. Its ends are destructive. It mounts quietly, almost unseen in the short-term view, but it is utterly devastating over time.

The President has called for tight reins on Government spending, and for a balanced budget. He has called upon all of us, as citizens for self-discipline in our economic actions, both as individuals and as groups. Government alone cannot win the battle against inflation. To win it—and we must win it—will require the united efforts of the American people—business, labor, banking, agriculture, and all economic groups.

Our expanding Federal Government has boosted the average family's tax bill from $120 to $1,600 a year. How much further can we go in this direction?

Many pressures are now being exerted to add more billions to Federal spending in the coming fiscal year, and beyond—billions that can bring on further deficits and inflation.

Contrary to what some people would have us believe, the Federal Treasury is not a bottomless grab bag which never needs to be conserved or replenished. To act as though there is no limit to what the Treasury can spend is an open road to the destruction of private enterprise, and its replacement by a socialistic economy.

We must have a tax policy which is not confiscatory and a budget policy which prevents inflation. The Nation must have sound farm programs—just as it must have sound banking and finance—and sound wage and price policies.

In the interests of the whole Nation, we need less government in farming. Quit trying to fix prices unrealistically from which flow the twin evils of production for Government warehouses and Government control of farmers. Emphasize markets, increased efficiency, and competitive selling. Eliminate Government's stranglehold on agriculture.

This is the solution to the farm dilemma.

We have made limited progress. We are on the right track. If we can push ahead soundly and keep the train from being derailed by those who put their faith in panaceas and quack remedies, agriculture in general and cotton in particular will regain lost markets, expand old markets, develop new markets.

Cotton is gaining in domestic use for clothing, about holding its own in household uses, falling far behind in outlets for industrial purposes. From 1947 to 1957 the domestic use of cotton for clothing increased 44 percent. But industrial use of cotton dropped 40 percent.

Always we come back to the essential point—markets depend on quality, price, and promotion.

Cotton ginners are a vital link in the chain of progress. I know that you have long had an important part in promoting quality improvement and in helping cotton on its way to the mills at minimum costs. Many of you have accepted the responsibility for taking cotton samples and shipping them to classing offices. Some of you are spokesmen for farmers, unhappy because grades are below expectations.

I urge you also to take an active interest in accurate price quotations. We must all strive to make further improvements in quality and market efficiency.

I hope ginners will be well represented at the universal standards conference to be held in Washington next month.

Some of you have seen the experimental "flight-bar" roller gin developed at our Mesilla Park Laboratory. In tests, it has turned out nearly 20 pounds of extra-long staple lint cotton per inch of roller per hour, an eightfold increase over the average commercial roller gin. Its capacity for relatively shorter staple upland cotton is 13 pounds, a sixfold increase over the average commercial roller gin.

Many mills are now using the machinery designed by our engineers to open, blend, and clean cotton. This year some 4 billion yards of new fabric will be given finishes that make cotton garments and household goods soil and crease resistant, with the wash-and-wear qualities demanded by today's homemaker. These finishes were developed with the aid of our chemists.

A year ago an industry-USDA study group recommended a pilot spinning facility be set up as part of the marketing research program for cotton. This plant is now being established at Clemson, S.C.

These many efforts are the starting point for knowledge on which a whole new technology can be based, a technology that will mean more efficient machinery in the gin as well as new cultural practices and processing techniques of benefit to the entire cotton industry.

All this is heartening, encouraging, stimulating.

I am not impressed with gloomy prophecies and defeatist talk about the future of cotton and agriculture as a whole. The future can be exciting, profitable, satisfying, progressive, a good time to live and work and raise a family.

What is called for is a joint undertaking to which our wholehearted cooperation is dedicated. I challenge you of the entire cotton industry to give us your cooperation and I pledge that you shall have ours.

I am dedicated to doing what is economically sound, fair, and right to help improve the position of farmers in our economy. I shall continue to pursue that goal of a more prosperous, expanding, and free agriculture.

With God's help, and the understanding and cooperation of groups such as this, whose futures are so closely allied with farmers', we shall reach that goal.

Is the Alaska Statehood Act Unconstitutional?

OF
HON. THOMAS M. PELLY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, in view of a recent statement by Alaska's Governor Egan to the effect that Alaska would not agree to let any fish traps operate and that he feels Alaska can challenge the constitutionality of provisions of the act of Congress upon which the Alaska statehood depends, I wish to point out that such a challenge places Governor Egan and the State of Alaska in a most peculiar position. The act authorized statehood only on the basis that the people of Alaska voted to approve the conditions set out in the act. Among these was one that there should be a period of transition as to control of fish and game, and that during such period, the Federal laws should continue in effect and fish and game remain under Federal management.

The important law, and the one in question to which Congress referred, is the White Act, under which fishing with traps is permissible, subject to general conservation limitations, the same as any other fishing gear.

It is well known that the opposition against the use of fish traps has nothing to do with conservation; in fact, traps can be more effectively regulated for conservation purposes than mobile gear. Representative WESTLAND and myself, in whose districts so many fishermen live who are dependent on fish traps for their jobs, were responsible for this provision. It was added for the express purpose of giving those fishermen, as well as the operators, a period of time to adjust themselves and their operations, instead of having an immediate shutdown of fish traps.

If Governor Egan is correct that these provisions are unconstitutional, there can be a serious question as to whether or not Alaska is a State. In such case, Alaska may still be a Territory, or at least I have understood it to be a rule in interpreting laws that if a provision of the law is unconstitutional, then if the court finds that the law apparently would not have been passed without that provision, the whole act must be thrown out.

My good friend, the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. RIVERS] himself has admitted that the Alaskans voted to accept statehood subject to the conditions imposed by Congress, but he contends that they did not wish to do so—they did it only because they wanted statehood—and therefore should not be bound by their votes.

I do not believe the people of Alaska can accept conditions imposed by Congress and later, after having attained statehood, reject those provisions as not binding upon them.

Meanwhile let me suggest that any threats of lawless violence with respect to fish traps, if such are allowed to operate under Federal law, do not lend credit to the new State. In a frontier community, as with the Old West, one expected occasional brawls, but self-government and statehood are supposed to mean the end of disorder and asurance of the principle of a government of law and not of men.

Statement of Hon. Melvin Price, of Illinois, in Support of Federal Unemployment Compensation Standards Legislation

OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith my statement to the House Committee on Ways and Means in support of legislation to estabilsh Federal unemployment compensation standards:

STATEMENT OF HON. MELVIN PRICE, OF ILLINOIS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, TO THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS IN SUPPORT OF FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION STANDARDS LEGISLATION

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate this committee for scheduling hearings on the critical issue of improved Federal standards for unemployment compensation and I am deeply grateful for the courtesy of the committee and of the chairman for allowing me to state the reasons I believe the committee should report a bill establishing such improved standards.

The bill I have introduced, H.R. 3580, like others before you, would strengthen the already existing Federal Standards Act under which the unemployment compensation laws of every State now operate. It would increase the number of workers eligible for unemployment insurance benefits, and in addition it would provide improved benefits for a maximum of 39 weeks in all of our States. These higher benefits would be payable so that a worker thrown out of a job by no fault of his own could draw weekly payments of at least two-thirds of his ordinary salary or wages, or one-half of the average of salaries and wages in his State, whichever is smaller.

Mr. Chairman, this expert committee is intimately familiar with the details of such legislative proposals and with the taxing programs that would be required to finance them. I believe that in the technical and tax fields my bill is sound, but I would like to discuss the general principles involved.

What is the origin of our unemployment compensation systems in our various States? Why, they came into existence by Federal action. A bill was passed by Congress, in the depths of the great depression nearly a quarter of a century ago, establishing a Federal tax upon employers to finance unemployment benefits. But the bill also contained a provision that if the States would set up their own systems, meeting certain standards laid down in the Federal law, most of the tax receipts would be remitted to the States for operating their systems.

And what has been the history of the systems? An enormous variety has come into existence, over and above the standards required by law, by which some States pay much more and some States much less than each other and than the average. There are differences in the eligibility rules, in the length of time for benefits, of the size of benefits, in the tax rates that employers now must pay to finance the systems that have been recognized as socially desirable.

This has had two very bad results. In the first place, there is a quite natural tendency in the State legislatures not to make swift and major improvements in their local systems that may lay a burden on business that does not exist in neighboring States. The members of this committee are practical, knowledgeable, well informed. You know the force of a witness' argument, before a State legislative committee, urging that taxes and social welfare programs be kept at a level that enables the State to remain competitive.

In the second place, this system has prevented the Federal law from working as it was supposed to work. What are the reasons for unemployment compensation? They are both humanitarian and economic. The theory is that benefits for a worker thrown out of his job will ease the shock and loss until he is able to find a new job; this is for the benefit of the worker and his family. But the further theory is that payment of benefits will maintain the worker's purchasing power, at a reduced minimum, so that the economy does not suffer a total loss in periods of severe recession. The economic reasons for jobless compensation benefits are as imperative as the humanitarian reasons.

I think it can be considered as proved that under the existing law, neither the humanitarian nor the economic objectives are being wholly met.

The statisticians report that during the recent recession, the loss in wages and salaries resulting from the unemployment of nearly 6 million was not compensated for in any adequate way. Perhaps 40 percent of the jobless never became eligible for any unemployment benefits at all, either because they were not covered under the general terms of the State laws or under the specific exemptions. And out of the total, not more than 30 percent of the wage loss was recovered through benefits.

I urge this committee to consider very seriously whether the time is not past for the breaking of new ground, for a giant stride forward that would cure the deficiencies which all of us can see have developed across the past quarter of a century.

Unemployment compensation, Mr. Chairman, seems to me one of the wisest programs of our modern age. Our economy is a marvelously efficient enterprise, but it is subject to the shifts and changes that are a part of the price of freedom. Jobless benefits, financed through an orderly system set forth by law, offer the most effective protection against individual suffering and the most effective cushion against shocks to our national health.

When we deal with the subject of improved Federal standards, let us recognize that we are doing nothing unprecedented. We got our system in the first place by the setting up of Federal standards, and I think it fair to say that without these standards we would not today have unemployment benefit programs in all of our States. What we are confronted with is the question of whether it is not necessary now to modernize the standards, to remove as between the States competition in low tax rates and low benefits, to cure weaknesses that the passage of time has revealed in the law as it was first written.

I am well aware that the President has thrown his weight, at least negatively, against the bill and the program for which I speak today. I can merely say that I consider this attitude extremely shortsighted—an example of a deplorable tendency in the White House to confuse the letter of States rights with the spirit that infuses our entire system of government. There is no genuine issue of States rights involved here, but merely a broader question of how we can wisely use information now available to us to strengthen a program that is very much in the interest of the country, a bulwark of our free enterprise system and a proper protection of our people.

This committee is well aware that common report has it that the Secretary of Labor was prepared to support a new Federal standards program until he was overruled by others in the White House. It is well aware that the first chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, Dr. Arthur Burns, believes that a swift improvement and expansion of our jobless compensation law is the greatest contribution we could make to maintaining a sound economy.

I respectfully suggest that this session of the Congress should take account of the passage of time since the unemployment compensation laws were written, should face the realities of the need for an improved system, should recognize its own opportunity to initiate a tremendous forward step. On this subject, I believe that bold thinking and bold action would meet with an overwhelming favorable public response.

Address by Representative William B. Widnall, of New Jersey, to National Committee of Section 608 Owners, Sherman Hotel, Chicago, March 18, 1959

OF

HON. B. CARROLL REECE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, Members of Congress and the public generally have an important interest in the continuing success of the various housing programs carried on under the National Housing Act. One of the most important of these was the veterans emergency housing program carried out under section 608 of the act. By the time the program was completed in 1953, 7,045 apartment houses containing 465,683 rental units were built, with mortgages insured by the FHA in the sum of $3,439,678,928. The program was a great success and now that nearly a decade has passed, it is increasingly important that we continue to review its progress.

Recently, Congressman WILLIAM B. WIDNALL, a member of the House Banking and Currency Committee, Subcommittee on Housing, made a speech to the national committee of section 608 owners at Chicago. His report and recommendations on this particular program should be of interest to all of us, and I am including it in the RECORD for that purpose. Carl L. Shipley, of Shipley, Akerman & Pickett, who is counsel for the section 608 owners, is well known to me and I am sure that with his help the national committee of section 608 owners can perform a real public service by cooperating with the FHA in promoting the economic stability of these apartment house projects.

The address follows:

As I left Washington, the omnibus housing bill was going through the same procedure that always seems to delay and confuse housing legislation. There is substantial agreement in the Congress on many programs. Typical is FHA, where an open-end authorization is fully warranted and would be supported wholeheartedly by members of both political parties. However, administration efforts in this direction and toward meeting the critical needs of the college dormitory and urban renewal program have been sidetracked because of the early effort to force public housing through the Congress.

Last session there was no housing bill because of these tactics and because of the unwillingness of the majority leadership to sever the noncontroversial items from those that were highly controversial. Senator LYNDON JOHNSON issued a forceful statement at the beginning of this session, saying that the Democratic leadership would have a housing bill on the President's desk by the first part of February. There is almost a 2 to 1 Democratic majority in both the House and the Senate and yet the first day of hearing before the House Rules Committee has just been scheduled for April 8. This situation occurs purely and simply because of the attempt to stuff down congressional throats new vast spending programs and 190,000 units of public housing.

A sound, progressive, well-rounded housing program can be enacted tomorrow with just a few changes well known to the Democratic leadership that would bring the presently proposed House bill within the borders of the budget.

Why does one undertake a quick round trip from Washington to Chicago in the middle of a congressional session? My answer would be because I feel the subject matter to be discussed before the national committee of section 608 owners, under the National Housing Act, is one demanding full recognition and far more attention than it has been given until very recently. When I say "attention," I am sure you understand what I mean, and not the type of attention accorded the 608 program by Congress several years ago. Although I was not in Congress at the time that your program came into being, I am fully aware of the intent of Congress through reading the RECORD and discussions with Congressmen who were present at the time. There was urgent need for housing and it appears to me the bill as originally conceived was loosely drawn with the intent of encouraging the prompt building of critically needed units. Out of that looseness came the windfalls and the practices that caused so much public clamor and placed the whole program in public disfavor. It seems to me this is the time to take a second look at the history and present status of the 608 program.

One of the very considerable accomplishments achieved under the National Housing Act was the FHA rental housing program in the period during and after World War II. At that time rental housing was badly needed, and private builders and investors like yourselves cooperated with the FHA in filling that need. Section 608 was added to the National Housing Act on May 26, 1942. It authorized the FHA Administrator to insure mortgages on property: "Designed for rent, for residential use by war workers." The principal amount of any such mortgage was limited to $5 million; and there was a further limitation of $1,350 per room. The act also provided that mortgages could not exceed 90 percent of the Administrator's estimate of the "reasonable replacement cost" of the completed project "including the land; the proposed physical improvements; utilities within the boundaries of the property or project; architects' fees; taxes and interest accruing during construction; and other miscellaneous expenses incidental to construction and approved by the Administrator." A further limitation was that the mortgage could not exceed the "amount which the Administrator estimates will be the cost of the completed physical improvements on the property or project exclusive of off-site public utilities and stores, and organization and legal expenses."

In addition, the FHA Administrator was authorized to require the mortgagor to be regulated or restricted as to "rents, or sales, charges, capital structure, rate of return, and method of operation." In order to enforce these restrictions effectively, the Administrator was authorized to acquire $100 of stock in any such mortgage corporation. In 1946 Congress amended section 608 of the National Housing Act to give priority of occupancy to veterans of World War II and their immediate families. The basis for the Administrator's estimate of cost was changed from "reasonable current cost" to "necessary current cost." In 1948 a maximum limitation of $8,100 per family unit was substituted for the previous maximum limitation of $1,800 per room which had been in effect since 1946. This turned out to be a very significant change in the law, and thereafter many projects were authorized in which 70 to 90 percent of the apartments were 1-room efficiencies. The 1948 amendment also provided that the principal obligation of the mortgage could not exceed 90 percent of the Administrator's estimate of the replacement cost of the property or project on the basis of costs prevailing on December 31, 1947, for properties of comparable quality in the locality. Also, a new requirement was added that the mortgagor must certify that in selecting tenants for the property covered by the mortgage, he would not discriminate against any family by reason of the fact that there were children in the family. During the years 1942–53, a total of 7,045 projects containing 465,683 rental units were built under section 608, with mortgages insured in the sum of $3,439,678,928. The great bulk of these projects were located in the East. For example, 18 percent of all the dwelling units were located in New York, 11 percent in New Jersey, 7 percent in Maryland, 6¼ percent in Virginia, approximately 4 percent in California, Pennsylvania, Texas, the District of Columbia, Georgia, Illinois, and Ohio. Florida, Alabama, Missouri, North Carolina and Michigan each had about 2 percent and the balance of the States had less than 2 percent, with 28 States having less than 1 percent. All in all, the 608 program was a remarkable feat, and while arguments have been made in some quarters as to the economic soundness of these projects, experience has shown that they are basically sound, and if well managed, will continue to be. This presupposes that the FHA will manage this program intelligently.

A Senate investigation in 1954 indicated that 6 or 7 percent of these projects had mortgages in excess of costs. There was some feeling at the time that mortgaging out, plus the fact that rent schedules generally were based on the FHA estimates of cost rather than on actual cost, resulted in higher rentals in some projects than might otherwise be the case. However, the impact of the approximate 500,000 rental units built under the section 608 program must have had considerable competitive effect upon rent levels generally. In all likelihood the mass effect of the units developed under the 608 program reduced rents far more than rents were increased as a result of mortgaging out.

I know that some of you have been much concerned about rent ceilings which continue to be imposed by the FHA Commissioner on these projects. The charter of each section 608 corporation permits the FHA to establish maximum rentals. These rentals were determined in advance of construction by the FHA project analysis which was the basis of the FHA commitment to insure the mortgage. Rentals were based upon the lower of market rental being paid for comparable accommodations or rentals which would provide a return of all operating expenses (excluding interest and amortization) and a 6½ percent net return on the estimated cost of construction, after an allowance of 7 percent for vacancies and for other loss of rental income. I believe it is fair to say that in actual practice the yardstick for measuring such rents was the 6½ percent net return on the estimated cost of the project. It is my understanding that the present FHA policy is to permit an increase in rents if operating expenses, taxes, or other recurring items of expense increased to a level beyond those used in the original FHA estimate. I heartily concur in this policy, because I believe it was the firm intention of Congress when section 608 was written into the National Housing Act, that investors in such rental housing should make a fair return on their investment. Indeed, I cannot imagine how such a program could have succeeded then or can succeed now unless these properties continue to be an attractive investment. I am aware that some mortgagor-owners of these projects feel that rent ceilings should be removed or should be revised to bring the rents into line with true market conditions.

In this connection, we must bear in mind that the apartment houses built under section 608 were originally intended for warworkers and later intended for the occupancy of veterans and their immediate families. As a Member of Congress, I firmly believe we must hew to this statutory purpose. However, as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, Subcommittee on Housing, I have come to realize that veterans and warworkers are no longer in desperate need of housing. Quite the contrary, many in these groups of persons have found accommodations in single family dwellings, many of them built under FHA programs. I believe the FHA must conform its present policies to the facts of economic life. Section 608 projects must be kept sound and healthy in order to protect the Government's contingent liability in the $3 billion of mortgages it has insured. The rental housing market in the areas where 608 projects predominate has changed from a sellers' market to a buyers' market. Competition has increased, newer projects which do not operate under FHA restrictions have swimming pools, tennis courts, offstreet parking, garage facilities, air conditioning, drugstores, and restaurants, and other facilities which make them competitively far more desirable. The FHA must help 608 projects meet this competition.

Most 608 projects have very substantial accumulations in their replacement reserves. I believe that the FHA, consistent with keeping enough money on hand to replace refrigerators, stoves, and similar items, should discontinue adding to this reserve after the 10th year of the life of a project. By that time, the 608 corporation has reduced the mortgage, and has a substantial equity in the property and an increased interest in replacing capital equipment as it wears out.

There may be occasions when it is necessary for the FHA to permit use of funds in the replacement reserve for capital improvements, such as swimming pools, air conditioning, awnings, landscaping, and other features, in order for a 608 project to maintain its occupancy and meet competition from newer rental housing. The rule of reason ought to be the test in every case, and not some outdated or inflexible regulation which was perfectly valid in 1944, but has no application today.

As I read the FHA annual reports, I am much concerned at the rate of defaults in 608 projects. If my memory serves me, nearly 700 of these apartment houses have been acquired by the FHA through assignment of the mortgage without foreclosure, or foreclosure and transfer of title to the FHA. This is a very serious matter both from the standpoint of the 608 program and the standpoint of the mortgagor-owner of the 608 corporation. I believe the FHA Commissioner has enough authority under section 223 and other provisions of the act, more particularly section 608 itself, to provide for indefinite deferral of amortization, or perhaps an administrative set-aside of a portion of the mortgage, to keep a project from going into default and ultimate foreclosure because of loss of occupancy, where this condition is due to causes beyond the control of the owner. Sometimes an important factory moves out of a community, or there is a localized recession and a 608 project loses more occupancy than can be absorbed and still meet monthly payments. In other cases, loss of occupancy may be due to the FHA single family dwelling program where, in some cases, the total downpayment and closing costs amount to less than the initial month rental and additional month security deposit required to get a new tenant into a 608. In these circumstances, it seems to me both the National Housing Act and the public interest require the FHA Commissioner to exercise all the authority he has to cooperate with the mortgagor-owner in saving the project from foreclosure.

Of course, I want to emphasize, I would not favor any help for 608 owners who give poor management or drain off all the earnings of a project so that it is in poor financial condition, or fail to cooperate fully with the FHA in maintaining the project.

In closing, let me say that section 608 of the National Housing Act places great authority in the hands of the FHA Commissioner. However, we Members of Congress on the Banking and Currency Committee have a responsibility to see that the law is administered fairly and intelligently and in keeping with its basic purpose. To that end we try to keep the various FHA programs under continuing review. There is at the present time pending in Congress a bill (S. 57) which gives former mortgagor-owners of 608 projects a priority of opportunity to reacquire a project in the event of foreclosure and ultimate resale by the FHA. Our committee reported out the Housing Act of 1959 with this amendment, and I hope it will stay in the bill when it becomes law.

In my opinion, 608 properties are basically sound, and given good management and a sympathetic and cooperative application of the law by the FHA Commissioner, will prove to be excellent real estate investments for their owners, and will continue to furnish excellent housing for the rental housing market.

It has been a pleasure for me to be here with you today and I congratulate you and the other members of the national committee of section 608 owners on the good job you are doing in cooperation with the Government.

Individual Liberties, National Security, and the Courts

OF
HON. JOHN V. LINDSAY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 13, 1959

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to include in the RECORD remarks that I made on the subject of the Supreme Court, individual liberties, and national security in a panel discussion conducted by the National Civil Liberties Clearing House in Washington a few days ago. I include these remarks in the RECORD because this subject currently is of such great importance and may come before the House shortly in the form of one or more bills designed to overcome certain decisions of the Court:

Today our attention is properly focused on the Supreme Court, which necessarily has been required to find a fulcrum between the forces seeking to broaden and tighten the circumference of our national security and those seeking perfection in the safeguarding of our individual liberties. It is the judicial branch, rather than the executive or legislative branches, that has been required for one reason or another, to assume the risks of decision in this field, and consequently has drawn the fire. If the lightning rod thus proffered by the judiciary has drawn the heat, the legislature and executive correspondingly have been spared. As a legislator I should be grateful for small favors. But I would be foolish if I didn't recognize that we are all part of this show, and will continue to be, and that responsibility for its proper performance must necessarily be shared by all of us.

I rather suspect it is a dangerous state of mind to become overly persuaded as to the cyclical nature of controversy over the Supreme Court. Like diseases of the body or intellect it will not do to adopt an "it will pass" attitude. If I am persuaded about anything it is that basic liberties do not maintain themselves and must continually be fought for. The mere fact that the Bill of Rights is pedestaled and permanently enshrined in the Archives Building insures us absolutely nothing. I fear that when one or more of our basic rights are destroyed they will not be felled like a giant tree under the woodman's ax, but will be whittled away, chip by chip, with no instrument more ominous looking than a pen knife.

It doesn't seem to do much good, however, to point out to those who view with despair and alarm certain decisions of the Supreme Court that the Court does not go about blithely creating constitutional dilemmas for itself; that the Court did not give the Negro darker skin than Caucasians; and that it did not plant in the minds of the Soviet dictatorship a thirst for world domination. And to those who seem to be guided by passion rather than reason it seems only to feed the flames of impassioned overstatement to point out that the Court must cut new paths in the course of resolving deep social and political clashes. These are clashes which are themselves made inevitable by the inexorable passage of time and the movement of history. And just as inevitably those paths lead across political soil. But if this be trespass, then time has stopped and the human situation remains frozen and unchanged.

Today the search for individual and collective security reaches such monstrous proportions that the preservation of the status quo has become a national craving. Material well-being, the sheltered life, and conformity blank out everything else. We assume that we will live forever and that what was good for us is necessarily good for our children and our grandchildren.

I do not mean to say here that in seeking new adjustments, in keeping with a changing world, the courts, or this Supreme Court, are infallible. Far from it. Their decisions and their methods of arriving at decisions are often quite properly subject to strong criticism, as often are the decisions and methods of the legislature and the executive. But there is need here for restraint. Being a legislator I of course reserve the right to be foolish. Being also human, I reserve the right to be nettled when the Court points out the error of my ways. But I can express my disagreement publicly—a prerogative that is not directly available to the courts. This is a distinction which legislators will do well to remember, along with the realization that the function of a judge is quite different from that of a legislator or administrator.

To the legislator, I suppose that Justice Holmes ought to be the ideal Justice. Alpheus Mason puts it this way, bringing in a rather well-known remark of Holmes: "Having himself no infallible measure of right or wrong, he (Holmes) upheld the programs and policies of legislators even though he considered them in error or foolish. As he himself said, 'I am so skeptical as to our knowledge about the goodness and badness of laws that I have no practical criterion except what the crowd wants. Personally I bet that the crowd if it knew more wouldn't want what it does—but that is immaterial.' Holmes was asked by a friend one day if he had ever worked out any general philosophy to guide him in the exercise of the judicial function, 'Yes,' the aged jurist replied. 'Long ago I decided that I was not God. When a State came in here and wanted to build a slaughterhouse, I looked at the Constitution and if I couldn't find anything in there that said a State couldn't build a slaughterhouse I said to myself, if they want to build a slaughterhouse dammit, let them build it.'" This would indicate a degree of judicial restraint that legislators would find admirable. But, I submit, it is a restraint which exists today in the Court far more than is generally recognized. And Holmes, like the present Court, was progressive in his interpretation of the Constitution and laws when the individual and personal liberties of human beings were at stake.

The briefest examination of previous uproars over the Supreme Court lends proof to the thesis "that time has upset many fighting faiths"; that much more is at stake in the present-day consternation about the Court than the reconsideration of a few decisions.

It is worth remembering, for example, that the political temperature surrounding the Supreme Court at the time of Marbury v. Madison was such that the new President, Jefferson, had refused to permit the Secretary of State to appear in the proceedings, and that the new Congress had not only repealed the Judiciary Act of 1801, defying Marshall and the Court, but even went so far as to legislate out of existence all terms for the Supreme Court scheduled for 1802. This step alone constituted one of the severest setbacks the Court has ever suffered. And then after Marshall had the audacity to hand down his opinion, now universally hailed, public statements condemning the Court came crowding in from every direction. The following excerpt from a contemporary letter to an editor is a mild example:

"Is it right, sir, that an extrajudicial opinion should be given * * * in any case? Is your tribunal organized to exhaust its time in dissertation on ordinary subjects of political speculation? To decide upon the merits of any cause without jurisdiction to entertain it (is) contrary to all law, precedent, and principle."

Some time later, after McCulloch v. Maryland, the South and the West lashed out at the Court for failing to strike down an act of Congress, much in the same tone that these sections had assailed the Court after Marbury v. Madison for having claimed the power to do so. As a matter of fact, Ohio refused to accept the McCulloch decision and forcibly seized money from the Ohio branch of the U.S. bank to cover the State taxes which the Supreme Court had flatly declared unconstitutional. Federal marshals had to unscramble that one.

No one here has to be educated about the attacks against the Court from the North after Taney's opinion in the Dred Scott case. The North's own Atlantic Monthly in protest wrote "* * * The most sacred and binding compacts of former years were annulled to make way for it; and the judicial department of the Government was violently hauled from its sacred retreat, into the political arena, to give a gratuitous coup-de-grace to the old opinions and the apparent sanction of law to the new dogma." And in a later issue: "Whatever the * * * Judges of the Supreme Court may seek to maintain, they cannot upset the universal logic of the law, nor extinguish the fundamental principles of our political system." Denunciations of this sort were immediately followed by plans and proposals to clip the Court's wings. There were few who foresaw that it would take a civil war to reverse Dred Scott. An error, no matter how basic, is not cured by abolishing or crippling the constitutional institution from whence it came.

The current consternation over some of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court in the area of national security is possibly small stuff compared to some of these more ancient battles that the Court has survived. But danger signs are nevertheless clearly present, particularly in the form of proposed legislation once again designed to curtail the jurisdiction of the Court.

History, common sense, instinct, and a small knowledge of the fallibility of systems, programs, and organizations all tell me that Watkins, Nelson, Cole, Kent, and Dayton are sound decisions and that the Court has properly exercised its legitimate powers in deciding them as it did. It misses the point to argue that these decisions and opinions give aid and comfort to those who would undo us. The function of the Court is not to oppose those who would overthrow us; it is to apply constitutional and legal principles to specific cases. It is even more absurd to attack the Court because of these decisions on the ground that the Court has overreached its powers. Even if one were tempted to call these decisions political moralizing they can hardly be said to break new frontiers—they only bring us back to a level of sanity below which this country had descended for a period of time, caught up as it was in a frenzy of fear out of all proportion to the facts. "Such fears as these," Learned Hand tells us, "are a solvent which can eat out the cement that binds the stones together."

May I comment briefly on one specific area, which is again before the Supreme Court in another context, and therefore I approach it with restraint. This is the question of the use of confidential information in the administrative process. A few weeks ago, in discussing the problem of passport legislation I summed up what I conceive to be the danger here as follows:

"The authority to use confidential information in the administrative process, under imprecise standards, coupled with the power to delegate the authority to subordinates, can result in a breeding ground of arbitrariness in the course of which innocent people may suffer."

Most people might generally agree with this statement as a matter of principle. But then the "for"—"buts"—and "ands" commence and we are back where we started. The high-wire balancing act performed by those who press for the preservation of the device is interesting. The most current argument is that it is universally used in other democratic countries in dealing with the question of passports and other aspects of national security. On reflection. I find this relevant but hardly material. Not long ago this country was regarded as the cradle of a new liberty and we thought it important to set up a structure which would safeguard our liberties from the arbitrariness of the sovereign. That structure imposed standards which I like to think are just a bit higher, go a bit farther, in protecting the individual from the possibility of arbitrary or capricious acts.

On a more practical note, it is interesting to look back on the action taken by the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization following the decision of the Supreme Court in Jay v. Boyd. That happened to be a case argued by me for the Government and by our friend Will Maslow as amicus curiae for the petitioner. In a 5 to 4 decision the Court sustained the use of confidential information in connection with the Attorney General's discretionary power to suspend deportation, under certain circumstances, of aliens otherwise deportable. The funny thing was that after the hullabaloo was all over the Commissioner of Immigration, a man of courage and fair instincts, met the still lingering problem head on and took steps to abolish, for all practical purposes, the use of the device in this area. A recent check with the Commissioner's office reveals that no case presently exists in which resort to the use of such information was found necessary to a decision. My point is that not only may the damage that can be done to individual liberties under such procedures be all out of proportion to the needs of the security that we seek to safeguard, but the corollary is also true, namely, that the advances we make in the safeguarding of individual liberties, however small, do much to strengthen the foundation of our liberties and, often to our surprise, do not result in any shocking impairment of our safety and security.

There will always be disagreement with the work of the Supreme Court. The Court does not labor in a vacuum. We may support the Court's conclusions, or we may oppose them. We are of course secure in our right to approve decisions of the Court only insofar as others are secure in their right to criticize them. But there is a difference between criticism and ignoble attack. The Supreme Court is a naked institution. The Constitution has provided it with no means of enforcing its decisions; its effectiveness as an institution and as a constituent element of our system of government rests entirely upon the voluntary acceptance of its decrees by other elements of government and by the people. Disagreement with the Court's decrees will not enfeeble its institutional strength. But disagreement coupled with broadside attacks upon the institution itself or upon the character or purpose of the justices will surely erode the institution at its base.

We, who by reason of training or office are in positions of public responsibility, have a duty to expose the destructiveness of any attempt to weaken the judiciary as an institution. Particularly in times of stress we cannot risk the loosening of our strongest bulwark against any enemy, namely our Constitution and the fundamental liberties embodied in it. Without a strong and independent judiciary the weakening of both our individual liberties and our national security will surely result.

TUESDAY, APRIL 14, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Father Joseph E. Thorning, Ph. D., D.D., pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Carrollton Manor, Md., and associate editor of World Affairs, offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, author of life and of love, let the light of Thy countenance shine brightly upon the Speaker of this House and all the Members of the U.S. Congress.

Impart, we beseech Thee, Thy best blessings to the Presidents of all the American Republics, to public servants everywhere, and to the peoples themselves, granting them the divine graces they need to uphold human freedom, genuine social progress, and the important values of our Judaeo-Christian heritage.

In this moment of history, when the forces of aggression are mobilizing to flaunt the noble principles of the Organization of American States and to overthrow American governments that have proven their devotion to the cause of inter-American friendship and security, strengthen our God-loving leaders throughout the Western Hemisphere to maintain the peace and to win victories against the international masters of deceit who continue to foment hatred and destruction.

In our rededication to the ideals of the good neighbor policy on this 15th congressional celebration of Pan-American Day, we implore new gifts of wisdom, courage, resourcefulness, and imagination characteristic of men and women of prayer, that we may grow in Thy friendship and in our love for one another.

We humbly seek Thy daily blessings in the name of our Most Holy Redeemer, the Christ of the Andes. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 2575. An act to authorize the appropriation of $500,000 to be spent for the purpose of the III Pan American Games to be held in Chicago, Ill.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill and a concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 12. An act to expedite the utilization of television transmission facilities in our public schools and colleges, and in adult training programs; and

S. Con. Res. 20. Concurrent resolution extending greetings to the Honorable Harry S. Truman on the 75th anniversary of his birth, May 8, 1959.

HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate Concurrent Resolution 20, extending greetings to the Honorable Harry S. Truman on the 75th anniversary of his birth, May 8, 1959, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States hereby extends to the Honorable Harry S. Truman its greetings, felicitations, and warm regards on the seventy-fifth anniversary of his birth, May 8, 1959.

SEC. 2. The Congress expresses its admiration and gratitude to President Truman for his many years of distinguished service to the United States and to the world. As a public servant and man of the people in the highest sense, he has gained the respect of all as the "Man of Independence".

SEC. 3. The Congress expresses particular appreciation for his dedication as Senator, Vice President, President, and author and elder statesman, in the battle against the enemies of freedom. His great efforts in the years following World War II helped unite the free world in its resistance to the common aggressor.

SEC. 4. The Congress expresses the hope that divine providence may permit Mr. Truman many more productive years of life and service to his country and to the world.

SEC. 5. A copy of this resolution shall be transmitted to that distinguished citizen of Missouri, the Honorable Harry S. Truman.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 336, making a supplemental appropriation for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year 1959, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object to this item because it was already in the appropriation bill which has been passed and is now over at the Senate. It takes the money that is appropriated out of that bill. But, I do want to call attention to the fact that this continued payment of unemployment compensation is prolonging the depression and that we will not get over the depression until we get rid of the unemployment compensation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sum is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, namely:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Bureau of Employment Security

Unemployment Compensation for Veterans and Federal Employees

For an additional amount for "Unemployment compensation for veterans and Federal employees", $40,000,000: Provided, That obligations incurred and expenditures made pursuant to this joint resolution shall be charged to the appropriation under this heading in the Second Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1959 (H.R. 5916), whenever such Act containing such appropriation is enacted into law.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution designed to meet an emergency budgetary situation. We have been advised by the executive branch that funds to continue making unemployment-compensation payments under formulas prescribed by law to eligible ex-veterans and former Federal employees are about exhausted. The payments are processed by the States from funds allocated by the Federal Government.

This resolution does not provide any additional funds beyond what the House has already approved. The second supplemental bill, H.R. 5916, passed on March 24, just before the Easter recess, carried $40 million as a supplement to the regular appropriation of $120,800,000 for fiscal 1959. That was occasioned by Public Law 85–848, enacted late in the last session, and providing a new permanent unemployment-compensation program for ex-servicemen.

The second supplemental bill is now in committee in the other body and will not be finally processed in time to meet the situation in the unemployment-compensation program. The pending resolution, in effect, lifts the $40 million from the supplemental bill and makes it available immediately. All expenditures made under this resolution will be charged to the appropriation in the supplemental bill when it becomes law.

I include letter of April 10 from the Director of the Budget:

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The second supplemental appropriation bill now before the Senate contains a 1959 supplemental appropriation of $40 million for the Department of Labor to pay unemployment compensation to veterans and Federal employees. This supplemental is occasioned by the enactment of Public Law 85–848, August 28, 1958, which granted unemployment compensation for ex-servicemen similar to that for former Federal employees. When the supplemental request for this purpose was transmitted, the brief experience with actual payments under the new law indicated that presently available funds would meet requirements until additional funds could be provided in the regular course of congressional action on a supplemental bill. However, the level of payments continued to increase and just before the Easter recess of Congress, when the House was prepared to act on the second supplemental bill, it became apparent that available funds might be exhausted before Congress could complete action on the supplemental in its regular schedule. Staff of your committee was advised of this situation informally and I advised the Under Secretary of Labor that we would make a check on the situation as soon as actual March figures were available and take whatever action seemed to be appropriate.

On the basis of payments reported as of March 31, it is estimated that presently available funds will be exhausted on April 15 in most States. March benefit payments amounted to $16,886,367, leaving a balance available for April payments of $11,382,076. April requirements are estimated at $17 million, about the same as those for March. While on a straight mathematical basis funds would run somewhat past April 15, the need for dispersal of available funds to the payment points in all the States means that restriction on payment of funds will probably be necessary in most States around April 15.

Since I understand that the Senate will not complete action on the supplemental bill until after April 15, and that that body is not in a position to originate the necessary action to make funds available on an urgent basis, I am writing you to recommend that your committee take action so that payments of these benefits will not be interrupted. A copy of this letter is being sent to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Sincerely yours,

MAURICE H. STANS,
Director.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE REVEREND FATHER JOSEPH F. THORNING AND INTER-AMERICAN UNITY

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, it was indeed a joy to hear the beautiful prayer offered this noon on Pan-American Day by my friend and the friend of many distinguished Members of the U.S. Congress, the Reverend Father Joseph F. Thorning, Ph. D., D.D., pastor of historic St. Joseph's Church, Carrollton Manor, Md., and honorary professor of international relations in the Catholic University of Chile, a pontifical institution.

Father Thorning, often at great sacrifice, has served the cause of inter-American friendship with intelligence, tact, courtesy, and good will. One of the notable factors in his success in promoting inter-American security and amity has been the respect he invariably shows toward all Members of the Congress, U.S. officials abroad and at home, intellectual leaders in the other American Republics, and toward the people themselves in every country he visits. The highest officials in the executive branch of the Government, including the State Department, have given repeated proof of the high opinion entertained in Washington about Father Thorning's personality, character, and talents. We are happy about his presence here today on the 69th anniversary of the Organization of American States, which was first designated as the Pan American Union.

The Pan American Union, started in the year 1890, always had as its objective the task of bringing the peoples of the Americas closer by advocating constant cooperation, mutually advantageous to all concerned.

In the course of their combined long history, the Pan American Union and present Organization of American States have done much to advance mutual aid, better understanding, and pacific settlement of all disputes in this part of the world. They have stood and now stand as a massive common front to combat the forces of insidious Communist totalitarianism in this hemisphere.

It is most gratifying that so great a group of nations as these 21 American Republics, covering such a vast area and including so many millions of human beings, always have a friendly way of working together in order to sustain a just and lasting peace. May we always and forever celebrate Pan American Day in peace, harmony, respect, and understanding of one another.

A WELCOME TO FIDEL CASTRO

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, Fidel Castro arrives in Washington tomorrow evening from Havana. He will be here through Monday afternoon. He will speak and answer questions before both the American Society of Newspaper Editors and before the National Press Club.

This is the man who overthrew Batista in the face of apparently hopeless odds. He has restored civil liberties, and promised free elections. He has given Cuba honesty in government. He has appointed many distinguished and able men to high positions—Agramonte, Lopez, Fresquet, Dihigo, and many others.

That is part of the plus side. There is an alarming minus side having to do in part with judicial processes, Communist infiltrations and anti-American statements. I believe in Castro's good faith. I believe he is a man who sincerely desires democracy and a better life for Cubans and for other citizens of Latin America. However inexperienced and unprepared he is as a chief executive, he is a brave man and an honest man whose trip to the United States can well be the occasion for essential education of both him and us.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, Ibn Saud, Trujillo, Khrushchev, Mao Tse-tung, or Franco consenting to be the aiming point publicly for the questions of our top editors and top reporters? We have questions for Castro. He has questions for us. From the answers may come a better understanding all around.

So, on this Pan-American Day, 1959, I say, "Welcome, Fidel—and remember: There are no indiscreet questions, just indiscreet answers."

ELECTIONS SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON HOUSE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Elections Subcommittee of the Committee on House Administration may sit today during general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Works may have until midnight tonight to file its report on the bill H.R. 3460.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR THIS WEEK

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time for the purpose of inquiring of the majority leader concerning the program for today and for the rest of the week in view of the action of the Committee on Rules of yesterday.

Mr. McCORMACK. The first bill that will be brought up today is H.R. 4601, amending the Federal Employees Retirement Act.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. What about the time allotted for remarks in connection with Pan-American Day?

Mr. McCORMACK. That will come up first. I was referring to the legislation that will follow that.

No. 2 is S. 1096, an authorization in relation to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

No. 3 is H.R. 1321, the reorganization plan of 1953. That concerns the Rural Electrification Administration.

No. 4 is House Joint Resolution 254, authorizing a parliamentary conference with Canada.

No. 5 is H.R. 2228, in connection with the acquisition of certain land on the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway.

Rules have been reported on those five matters. A rule has not yet been reported on the next bill, but I understand the Committee on Rules is meeting tomorrow, and if they report a rule on it, I have the intention of bringing it up on Thursday, if possible. That is H.R. 5674, authorizing the construction of certain military installations.

If a rule is reported out tomorrow or this week on the housing bill, that bill will not come up this week, but I shall program it for next week.

Mr. HALLECK. Can the gentleman give us any information as to the probability of that rule's being reported so the bill will be on next week?

Mr. McCORMACK. I wish I could. I am very optimistic, particularly with a very able assist by my friend from Indiana.

I know of no further legislation to come up this week, but I make the usual reservation that if there is any addition to the program I shall announce it later.

Mr. HALLECK. As I understand, these bills will be called in this order and continued until they are disposed of?

Mr. McCORMACK. That is correct, except that if a rule is reported out on the military installations bill and the other bills are not through by Wednesday, I have made a promise to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON]—and I like to keep my promises and hope the House will enable me to do so—to bring that bill up on Thursday.

GENEVA AGREEMENTS

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post and Times Herald this morning reports Vice President NIXON in his speech made last night in New York City as stating:

> Vice President NIXON insisted that the 1955 summit conference in Geneva, called a failure by its critics, was a success in terms of agreements reached. The difficulty has come, he said, because Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev's understanding of the agreement "was ostensibly different from ours."

That is diplomatic language of the Vice President for saying that the Soviets violated the agreements reached at Geneva, the same as they have violated or nullified every agreement for the last 30 years when it helped with their program of world aggression.

> The Vice President further cited as an example the unfulfilled Geneva agreement to settle German reunification "by means of free elections," as an example of the Soviets not carrying through with their agreements.

I ask that the Members read in this morning's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of Monday, April 13, on page 5788, a review made by me on the floor of the House yesterday setting out excerpts of testimony by ex-President Hoover and about 15 other witnesses who testified before the Committee on Communist Aggression in the 83d Congress. The facts set out in my speech of yesterday will verify the thoughts set out by the Vice President in his speech last night. I have today written Acting Secretary of State Herter to recommend to our representatives at the coming foreign ministers meeting to consider the sanctity of international agreements and past violations by the Soviet leaders as the No. one item on the agenda for the proposed summit conference. The problem of flagrant disregard for treaty and pact agreements must be considered at the summit conference or the gathering of world leaders will again serve as a platform for the Soviet leaders to publish and circularize their false and malicious propaganda to enhance Soviet prestige throughout the world.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S MANDATORY OIL IMPORT CONTROL PROGRAM WILL PREVENT FURTHER DESTRUCTION OF THE NATION'S COAL INDUSTRY AND STOP THE DECLINE IN EMPLOYMENT IN THE MINING AND RAILROAD INDUSTRIES

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the White House decision to restrict residual oil imports through mandatory controls has been received with grateful enthusiasm in areas whose economic distress is directly attributable to the unfair competition that emanates in alien refineries. The news is particularly appreciated in coal-producing communities and railroad centers, where the erosion of job opportunities has been more and more noticeable since international shippers began their insidious invasion of east coast fuel markets more than a decade ago.

Although Congress included in its extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act a provision honoring the import-regulation recommendations of the Presidential Advisory Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources, the fuel profiteers who peddle their wares over the sealanes chose to make their own rules in a campaign to monopolize coastwise markets. The voluntary program, which the U.S. Government very generously adopted on the assumption that importers would comply with findings of the executive department and the intent of Congress, was no more effective than a wire fence would be in stemming the tide of residual oil imports.

Let me give you just one example of the arrogance exhibited by those oil runners operating between Venezuela and the Dutch West Indies and our own Atlantic seaboard. From January 1 to March 27 of this year an average of 807,500 barrels per day of foreign residual oil was poured into this country. These shipments, which are in sharp contrast to the 603,400 barrels averaged during the corresponding period of the preceding year, set a new alltime record of abuse and disrespect for the national economy and security by international oil.

You are aware of what unreasonable import policies are doing to the working people of this country. You need only to look at the Department of Labor's statistical tables on surplus labor to recognize the hardship which excessive residual oil imports have brought to central and western Pennsylvania. Many of our miners and railroaders have been unemployed for several years, the number mounting as torrents of imported residual oil swamped industrial fuel markets in continued intensity. It is unlikely that we are going to get many miners back to work as a consequence of the White House order imposing mandatory controls, but you may be sure that the decision will have an important psychological effect. The miners whose working time has been cut down to 2 or 3 days a week have understandably looked with fear to a continuance of policies permitting oil from abroad to threaten their very economic existence. With the new cutback, these workers are greatly relieved and have come to hope that the fuel they produce will once again be accepted in its traditional and legitimate industrial markets.

And what about the thousands of other members of our labor force who long ago were deprived of their means of livelihood because the market for coal had been usurped by traders in a foreign product? They are not so optimistic as to assume that the Presidential action will stimulate a sudden upward spiral in demand for bituminous coal. They are, however, highly encouraged at the recognition which has finally been accorded the coal industry. They are optimistic enough to feel that the decline in coal production will now be reversed and before too long output will reach a point where greater manpower will be required.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we hail President Eisenhower's action. It was based upon coal's importance to the national security, but without question it will also have a favorable economic effect.

The Nation as a whole should join us in welcoming the action of the executive department. No one can be blind to the fact that an explosive situation centers around Berlin. The ruthless aggression by Communist China in Tibet is further evidence that America's military structure must be sustained at full strength until the Soviet propensity for world domination is neutralized.

President Eisenhower recognizes that excessive residual imports are destructive of important components of the mobilization base. He is aware that a vigorous domestic fuel industry is essential to the national safety. The decision to enforce mandatory controls on residual oil imports was based on the fact that our coal industry could not be expected to meet the accelerated demand of an emergency period unless reasonable output and development are possible in the interim period.

Collaterally, the Nation's railroads must not be neglected if we are to maintain the defense capability essential in this crucial period. The cutoff of railroad coal traffic because of inequitable residual oil import competition has posed a serious logistics problem. Unless sufficient gondolas and hoppers are activated now, coal could not be moved with expediency to points of consumption when the chips are down.

Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to continue to seek legislation restrictions that will further reduce the amount of residual oil permitted to enter this country. Meanwhile, the President is to be congratulated for his forthright stand on this all-important issue.

PAN-AMERICAN DAY

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 241) extending cordial greetings of the House of Representatives to the representative bodies of each of the other American Republics on the occasion of Pan-American Day, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas April 14, 1959, sixty-ninth anniversary of the Pan American Union marks another milestone in the continuous and mutually gratifying relationship of the twenty-one American Republics; and

Whereas the House of Representatives during the sixty-nine years has encouraged the growth of inter-American cooperation for the common security and welfare, and has frequently commended the contributions to that end made through the Pan American Union, which is now seat and secretariat of the Organization of the American States; and

Whereas the Organization of American States is dedicated to the achievement of peace and justice, the promotion of hemispheric solidarity, and the mutual defense of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence of the American Republics; and

Whereas the twenty-one respective legislatures traditionally honor the observance of April 14 as Pan-American Day, symbolizing inter-American friendship; and

Whereas the House of Representatives is cognizant that the friendship is one of the greatest safeguards of our mutual security, cemented by fraternal bonds which contribute to peace and progress in this hemisphere and consequently throughout the world; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives extend to the representative bodies of each of the other American States on the occasion of Pan-American Day its cordial greetings and profound desire for the maintenance of mutually beneficial relationships, in recognition of the progress already achieved toward our common objectives of inter-American cooperation and solidarity to the peace and security of the hemisphere and of the free world.

Copies of this resolution shall be distributed to the legislatures of the American Republics and to the Secretary General of the Organization of American States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may extend their remarks immediately following the remarks I am about to make and also that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their remarks on the subject of Pan-American Day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THORNBERRY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, this day, April 14, is commemorated in our American Republics as Pan-American Day. The significance for American peoples is demonstrated in this annual festival of freedom, friendship, and good will.

Pan-Americanism is a concept that goes back to the time of the great liberator, Simon Bolivar, who was the first to call a convention of American states, the Congress of Panama, in 1826. Bolivar's aim was to form a confederation to protect the hemisphere from outside attacks and to settle inter-American disputes. This year we received with great pleasure a magnificent statue of that noble South American visionary as a gift of the Venezuelan people.

Today we celebrate the 69th anniversary of the realization of Bolivar's idea. The first International Conference of American States, called by Secretary of State James G. Blaine, was held in Washington in 1889–90. One United States newspaper, reflecting the prevailing opinion, announced darkly:

The Pan-American Conference is pronounced a failure by those most concerned.

But from that failure came the seed of the oldest, most effective, international organization in the world. The first Inter-American Conference established a Commercial Bureau, designed to distribute commercial information to merchants and shippers. It had neither constitution nor charter, and was considered so unimportant by its member nations that no ratification was required.

Nevertheless, the Commercial Bureau provided a nucleus for inter-American cooperation. By the third conference in 1906, topics other than those of a commercial nature were considered suitable for the agenda. In 1910, the beautiful Pan American Union Building that we all know was built here in Washington, giving an aura of permanence to the idea of inter-American cooperation.

Over the years, as the American States began gradually to realize the need for closer political relations, machinery was established to settle inter-American disputes and to guarantee the security of the hemisphere. Questions of international law, agriculture, transportation, communications, health, sanitation, education, and economic development became objects of inter-American cooperation.

In the post-World War II period, the 21 American Republics formularized in two principal documents their unique relationship which had grown over almost half a century. The inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, commonly known as the Rio Pact, was signed in 1947. The Rio Pact provides for collective action to maintain peace and security within the hemisphere and to defend the Americas against any aggression from without.

The second basic document, the Charter of the Organization of American States, was drawn up at Bogota, Colombia, in 1948. In essence the charter defined and codified inter-American practices which had developed gradually through trial and error over the years. The purposes of the OAS are:

First, To strengthen the peace and security of the continents.

Second. To prevent possible causes of difficulties and to insure the pacific settlement of disputes that may arise among the member states.

Third. To provide for common action on the part of those states in the event of aggression.

Fourth. To seek the solution of political, juridical, and economic problems that may arise among them.

Fifth. To promote, by cooperative action, their economic, social, and cultural development.

The ability of the Rio Pact to preserve hemisphere peace has been demonstrated in several occasions. In 1948–49 a peaceful settlement in a dispute between Costa Rica and Nicaragua was brought about. In 1950, the Council of the OAS, by quick action, averted possible armed conflict involving a number of Carribbean countries. Renewed conflict between Costa Rica and Necaragua in 1955 ended when the Council of the OAS again took action to preserve peace.

The effectiveness of the Rio Pact in keeping the peace does not rest in its mechanisms. The real strength of the treaty lies in the determination of the member states to keep the peace because all know their own well-being and prosperity can be achieved only by living in harmony and concord.

We have come a long way since the first timid excursion into inter-American cooperation 69 years ago. The road was not always easy. Debates at inter-American conferences, especially before the good neighbor policy was instituted, were often bitter and acrimonious. Recently, economic problems have led to misunderstanding and to denunciations.

Dr. Alberto Lleras Camargo, the former Secretary General of the Organization of the American States, and currently President of Colombia, had some wise words of caution to those of us who might become impatient with developments in the OAS. He said:

> The economic problems of inter-American life are surely not more difficult than were those of a political nature in the past. The latter were in fact so thorny that when attempts were made to put off debate on them or to ease the attendant strain, it was customary to turn to economic topics, as something pleasanter, more congenial to everyone, of mutual interest, and of slight import.
> Today that is no longer true, obviously. There are serious conflicts of interest, and economic views that appear to clash just as much as, early in this century, the corollaries of the Monroe Doctrine might have jarred with the principle of nonintervention. Millions of words, some of them harsh, some pleasant, some wrathful and others persuasive, had to be exchanged via the channels of the Organization before essential agreements were reached that made it impossible to differ any longer on the first principles of pan-Americanism. The same thing is bound to happen in this other field, in which solidarity is no less important, distinctive, and indispensable than it is in purely political fields.

No matter how insurmountable our problems of the moment might appear, we have demonstrated, as Dr. Lleras pointed out, over more than two-thirds of a century that we can devise solutions. The Organization of American States, whose anniversary we pay tribute to today, is the living monument to the achievements of patient, wise, dedicated men from both north and south of the Rio Grande. Today, we renew our pledge to fortify this most successfully sustained adventure in international community living that the world has ever seen.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDEN. I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in the celebration of Pan-American Day. Not only is it an occasion of deep and far-reaching significance, but it is an occasion celebrated throughout almost the whole of the Western Hemisphere. Nor is this celebration just by individuals or groups here and there; it is by schoolchildren, clubs, churches, communities, governments, and by international bodies in all 21 countries of Pan America. Pan-American Day is honored by means of public ceremonies, by means of forums, fiestas, parades, press, radio, official proclamations, legislation, and international exchanges. The significance of this widespread recognition is manifold.

My good friend, Rev. Father Joseph F. Thorning, has for years taken an active and effective interest in Pan-American Day, and the strengthening of friendship between the countries of the Western Hemisphere.

People are accustomed to honoring a man or an event, to observing a national occasion or a religious festival. But this day is set aside to honor an idea and an ideal. The idea has taken concrete form in international political arrangement. We commemorate a day in 1890 when on April 14, the First International Conference of the American States met in Washington and adopted a resolution which resulted in the voluntary association in one intercontinental community of 21 sovereign republics. We proclaim the perpetuation of this union and the continuity of the common bonds and common hopes of the peoples on two continents. And we herald abroad the very real and concrete benefits that have derived from many faceted international cooperation among these 21 American nations.

In Havana, Cuba, there stands today the tree of peace planted in soil sent from each of the nations of the Organization of American States. It is watered by symbolic contributions from each one of these countries. The Organization of American States has taken just pride in the furtherance of international peace throughout the Americas. It takes pride in the practical application of the solidarity symbolized in this tree planting and nurturing.

Were the international cooperation and fundamental unity of the Americas to be emulated by the nations of the world, there need be no questions of sacrifice of sovereignty, of seigniority, or of national pride. There would be, quite the reverse, an enhancement of the national dignity of the individual nations in lending themselves and their efforts to a world of brotherly interest and understanding.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I, too, am happy to participate in this observance of Pan-American Day.

Mr. Speaker, in the crowded and somber calendar of current international events this day, April 14, is a date which brings with it hope and optimism and good cheer. For this day celebrates that solidarity which has grown during many years between the republics which comprise our hemisphere and which provides one of the principal bulwarks of law and order in the modern world.

It may be interesting to recall briefly two or three outstanding events in the history of Pan Americanism by which we may measure the road we have journeyed. These events are planted like milestones along the way and gather unto themselves a certain special significance.

Such was the Congress of Panama summoned by Simon Bolivar in 1826. Bolivar had a vision far ahead of his times. In his invitation to the former Spanish colonies to send representatives to the Congress—and he could have been speaking yesterday—he suggested that the Congress "should act as a council in great conflicts, to be appealed to in case of common danger, and be a faithful interpreter of public treaties when difficulties arise, and conciliate, in short, all our difficulties." Bolivar died in bitterness thinking he had "plowed the sea" but our generation has seen his wish translated into reality.

Another date we like to recall marked the sessions of the first Intercontinental Conference of American States in Washington in 1889–90. The U.S. Congress played a substantial role in the convening of that Conference. For several years before it was held, resolutions were introduced in the House and Senate advocating such a meeting. In 1888 an act of Congress authorized the President to invite delegates from all the independent countries of Latin America to meet in Washington the following year. The then Secretary of State, James G. Blaine, expressed in his opening address to the Conference that spirit of cooperation and awareness of the interests of each nation represented which has characterized pan-American relations down to our day. He said that the assembled delegates could "show to the world an honorable and peaceful conference of independent American powers, which will seek nothing, propose nothing, endure nothing that is not in the general sense of all the delegates timely, wise, and peaceful."

We in this Chamber have ourselves witnessed the most heartening advances in inter-American unity. During the postwar years the inter-American system has grown both in stature and in strength. One event has been particularly outstanding during this period: the signing of the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, or the Rio Pact, in September 1947. This pact was the culmination of many years of evolution of inter-American principles and inter-American cooperation. When World War II flared in all its multiple horror in Europe and Asia and reached over into the Western Hemisphere, the paramount need for security caused the American Republics to draw closer together in order to repel the enemy. It became unmistakably clear, during those perilous years, that an attack against one American state endangered all and should be resisted by all together. The Rio Pact has taken solid root in the inter-American system because it is based on the principles and collective needs of the American states. It represents no arbitrary imposition of any state but is the result of a will to agree among them all. It is designed for the protection of all and imposes upon all certain duties and obligations. The Rio Pact has in the past decade become a cornerstone of the inter-American system.

But the successes of the past should not blind us to the needs of the future. We live in an age of constant change. The inter-American system must be kept abreast of change, must be kept flexible and responsive to the needs of its members. Certainly, the need for economic cooperation is a principal need today. Freedom from want is basic to political stability. The evolution of democratic institutions is predicated on the elimination of poverty and ignorance and disease. The task of economic advancement is one that calls for the best efforts of the leaders of our Western Hemisphere. We look to these leaders, in both public and private life, to write the new bright chapter in the history of inter-American relations.

The inter-American unity which has been won at so much cost is but the prelude, we can hope, to even greater understanding, progress, and cooperation in the future.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDEN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to pay my personal word of tribute to Father Joseph Thorning, whose trail has crossed mine in a number of out-of-the-way places in South America. He is just as apt to be found riding a burro down the Andes in Bolivia as anywhere else. You will find him almost anywhere in the hemisphere. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, he has done as much as any living American toward furthering an understanding between the Republics.

Mr. Speaker, Pan-American Day has become the occasion in the Congress and in other parliamentary bodies throughout the hemisphere, for the reaffirmation of certain fundamental principles to which the sister Republics adhere. It is a time of inventory—an hour—or perhaps less, when the bonds which hold this unique community of nations and peoples together, are examined and tested to the end that they may be strengthened where they have become weak and rewoven where some fibers have worn thin or broken. This day gives us as North Americans an opportunity to express our national regard and that of our people to those who inhabit with us this fruitful and gracious hemisphere.

That there are problems to be solved in the hemisphere none will deny. That there is frank discussion of controversial matters none can decry. In political, economic, and military spheres there are honest differences of opinion between equally honest men as to the proper courses of action to be pursued. In recognition of this fact the Organization of American States was brought into being and exists today as the principal instrument for the orderly adjudication of disputes between its own members. That heated debate accompanies many of the actions of OAS is in itself testimony to the effective application of the rule of law and of reason. We, who are privileged to live in the hemisphere, have abundant reason to be grateful to the Organization of American States and to the leading statesmen from the member Republics who have consistently demonstrated wisdom in their deliberations, and an understanding of individual and national frailties. Today we pay tribute to those from all of the Republics who have built a greater measure of multilateral and international understanding upon a firm foundation of faith and confidence in the future of the Americas.

As one is not born into the world with complete understanding of the mysteries of life, neither is a land emerging from feudalism created in the image that all might prefer. Industrialization and integration into the complexities of a new political and economic era has posed serious problems for many of the governments in the lands to the south of us, but it is to the credit of all that so few mistakes have been made. We, who come to the Congress from California, share a long and close relationship with Mexico. It has been said that Los Angeles is the second largest Mexican city in the world in point of population. We have watched with satisfaction the tremendous strides that our neighbor to the south has taken in achieving a high degree of political and economic maturity. The achievements of Mexico have been repeated in varying degrees from Tierra del Fuego to the northern borders of Guatemala.

It has been so truly said that to know a man is to like him. During my more than 12 years on the House Committee on Foreign Affairs and on the Inter-American Subcommittee of that great committee, I have been privileged to visit all of our sister Republics on one or more occasions. I have come to know and respect the peoples of Latin America and to realize that we share with them the same high goals and purposes. I have also learned that we cannot adopt an arbitrary standard of political perfection and ask our neighbors and friends to stretch themselves out on it in order that we may determine whether or not they measure up, individually and collectively, to our concept of what we believe they should be. One of the great lessons of life, and one that some people never seem to learn, is to mind one's own business, to be a good neighbor, to teach by precept and example rather than by the dogmatic posture that indicates an unmistakable and condescending superiority.

Latin America is rich in natural and human resources, but we seek nothing in that area but understanding and friendship. For many years we have assisted our neighbor Republics in their own efforts to improve the economic lot of their peoples. Through technical cooperation, by the programs of student and leader exchanges, and in a score of other ways, we have endeavored to make a contribution toward the ultimate realization of the hopes and the aspirations of 170 million neighbors. Thousands of Latins in all of the countries of the hemisphere have received education and training here in the United States. They know us and they know our ways, and as translators of the North American scene in their own lands, they constitute a bridge of understanding in a world in which many bridges have been washed away by torrents of hatred and ill will.

The Angles and the Saxons left us a common heritage, based in common usage and tested through centuries. We North Americans have pursued ideals instead of idols, and principles instead of personages. This has not always been the case in Latin America, and the predilection for strong leaders and for forceful and sometimes arbitrary governments has, at one time or another, led each of our neighbors away from the path which we in this country consider leads to government by law and not by man. However, I stress again, Mr. Speaker, that the mores, the traditions, the customs, and the culture of Spanish America were quite unlike those which have governed the course of our own national history. The remarkable point is that so many of the Republics have modeled their own constitutions on our own, and that such great strides have been accomplished toward the realization of the ideal set forth in the several constitutions. It would be well for all of us to pay less attention to the hole in the political doughnut of Latin America and a little more heed to what surrounds it.

I am happy, Mr. Speaker, to add my words of greeting and felicitation to our friends in all parts of our hemisphere today. We shall continue to lend every assistance and encouragement to the sister Republics as they exert their individual and collective efforts to achieve their national goals of self-reliance and economic and political stability. Our position is that of a co-equal partner in a common effort, anxious and willing to be helpful where our assistance is needed and requested.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL].

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, those of us in the House of Representatives who have had opportunity to meet with our hemispheric neighbors to the south through governmental, professional, and industrial conferences, social meetings, and in our work in Congress are constantly appreciative to greater degree each year the striving and high goals which the Republics of the Americas have set for themselves. It is today—Pan-American Day—the anniversary of the founding of the Pan American Union—that we traditionally and formally reaffirm the expressions of friendship among the 21 member nations of the Organization of American States.

Historically, we are linked. All Americans recognize the necessity of fostering the personal and political ties which have brought together the members of the organization—the first regional arrangement under the United Nations. The example of mutual respect and friendly cooperation set forth by this international body has, since its inception, been an inspiration to the world. By inter-American examples of democracy in action and the resultant achievements in cultural and economic progress, the free world position in international tides is increasingly strengthened.

Progress and healthy growth are the combined ambitions of all Americans. Through international forums on mutual problems, cooperative efforts have been established by way of which we are able to help one another. Exciting strides are being made in the Americas, jointly and independently. Pride and determination have been the keynotes. U.S. assistance through government and private endeavors has been extended. And emerging is a world area full of unlimited potentiality.

The abounding human and physical resources of our sister Republics are a potentiality which, combined with incentive, capital, and proper political climate, can bring about tremendous development. Key strategic materials are supplied by Latin America which the United States heavily imports, such as vanadium, crude petroleum and fuel oil, copper, antimony, cadmium, tungsten, and manganese. In 1958, the United States sold to the South American Continent $2.2 billion in factory-made products. The United States bought from the continent $2.3 billion in vital materials.

United States private investment is being encouraged in Latin America, consistent with a firm policy of mutual governmental long-range cooperation. Under our mutual security and related programs, much is being done toward helping our friends achieve what they desire in the fields of education, health, housing, and agriculture. Long-term loans for important projects have been willingly made where funds are available and based upon a country's capacity to absorb capital. The Export-Import Bank, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Finance Corporation, the International Monetary Fund, the Development Loan Fund, and private investment are doing a wonderful job of putting capital to work for economic betterment. The proposed new inter-American financial institution will be of great benefit. The possibility of economic integration and establishment of the common market concept is being explored.

However, Latin America's problems are manifold. Projected population growth figures are a source of concern in many ways to leaders in the Americas. Economic difficulties are apparent. One-product economies provide little flexibility—the need for greater industrialization and diversification is recognized and desired, but is frustratingly slow and not brought about overnight. Further development of transportation is urgently needed. Illiteracy and disease must be conquered. It is to these needs that we direct our attention and understanding.

Particularly in my State of Florida, because of heritage and proximity to Latin America, have we taken great pride in our relationships with our neighbors. The tremendous amount of business and travel with and from the Americas to the south has been both enjoyable and profitable. Coral Gables, Florida, has been the first city in the United States to form a sister-city relationship with a Latin American city under the people-to-people program. The residents of Coral Gables and Cartagena, Colombia, have made many worthwhile and lasting friendships through their personal association brought about by the program. This body recently had opportunity to overwhelmingly endorse a resolution extending a cordial welcome to the Inter-American Bar Association, presently meeting in Miami. We in Miami are honored to be able to receive this organization.

And so it is my belief that mutual understanding is essential to overcoming the conflicts and economic and political problems which we face. We must not lose sight of our common objectives of security in world affairs and a better life for all Americans. Our collective defense agreement—the Rio Treaty—is of vital importance. For only in an attitude of security and peace can common prosperity and individual freedom be achieved. The American Republics have provided freedom and human liberty for most of their people. However, freedom is constantly threatened by greed and tyranny; and freedom must be protected. This was recognized by Simon Bolivar, who envisioned the mutual defense pact in which we are today engaged with our neighbors.

Continual emphasis must be shown on our part of our concern for the welfare of our friends. Their aspirations are our aspirations and we shall continue to share in the benefits reaped from freedom and prosperity.

The affirmation of our friendship and high regard for one another is a pleasurable and memorable event which takes place on this day each year; and I am glad to be able to join in paying tribute to the original concept of American hemispheric solidarity now known as the Organization of American States.

PAN-AMERICAN DAY

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] is recognized.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDEN. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have just called by telephone the Foreign Relations Committee of the other body and I find that that committee is about to act on the Presidential appointment of Hon. Clare Booth Luce, a former able colleague of ours, who has been appointed by President Eisenhower as Ambassador to Brazil. I congratulate the President upon his selection. I know, Mr. Speaker, that she will add a great deal to the understanding and good will of Brazil and the United States just as she did when she was an Ambassador, and a brilliant one, to Italy. She instilled in the people of that country a desire to develop a good many of their resources and she improved friendly intercourse with the United States. I am delighted to report this to my colleagues.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the gentleman from Alabama for his very fine statement regarding our relationship with the Pan American Union, and to say how sorry I am not to serve with him on the Foreign Affairs Committee. I had to leave that committee to take the chairmanship of another committee.

I have always had the pleasantest relations with the people of the Latin American Republics. I was tremendously pleased to be one of the observer-delegates at the conference in Mexico City some years ago when we voted the act of Chapultepec Military Alliance of many of the countries of America and made it a fact that if one of the countries of the Southern Hemisphere should be attacked we would go to their assistance. The conference was held under the leadership of the late Edward Stettinius, Secretary of State, and it was considered one of the most successful of the pan-American conferences. The country of Mexico and the courtesy of the Mexicans made an indelible impression upon me.

I have always enjoyed the friendship of the Latin American people. When my husband first came to Congress years ago, he was a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and we saw the people of the pan-American countries very often. Some of the pleasantest and finest friends I have ever had have been people from Latin American countries.

Mexico, our next-door neighbor, is helping us with some of our problems, and I hope that we can always help that country with its problems.

This is true of other countries of the Southern Hemisphere. We do not always agree, but I believe that by friendly interchanges and by mutual trade development we can accomplish great things.

In these dangerous and confused days in world affairs, the understanding and unity of the pan-American groups gives great strength to our great part of the world.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDEN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, today is Pan-American Day, a day which marks the 69th anniversary of the Organization of American States. It is fitting and appropriate that we commemorate the birth of this organization which, since it was founded in 1890, has worked toward a closer unification of the 21 American Republics. On this annual occasion we are provided opportunity to take a fresh look at the common principles and policies which bind the countries of the Western Hemisphere so firmly together.

While already universally recognized as the most successful regional organization in the world, notable progress has been made toward strengthening the Organization of American States even further during the past year. New levels have been reached in political and economic cooperation among the member states. The Committee of Presidential Representatives, formed at President Eisenhower's suggestion in 1956, has been active in its consideration of economic and social problems. Recommendations of this Committee have been translated into such tangible programs as malaria eradication, agricultural improvement, public housing, and a variety of technical studies.

Continuing efforts are being made to broaden the cultural ties between the United States and Latin America. Our educational exchange programs have been expanded and augmented. In the academic year 1957–58, approximately 8,000 Latin American students studied in U.S. institutions, in addition to large numbers of specialists and technicians exchanged under bilateral technical cooperation programs. Growing interest in Latin America is evidenced by the scores of pan-American societies throughout the United States, which are actively engaged in promoting a broadened understanding of our neighbors to the south.

One of the most significant developments of the past year was the announcement that the United States would participate in the establishment of an Inter-American Development Bank. Creation of such a multilateral development institution serving the needs of the region as a whole will represent an important milestone in inter-American relations. At the same time we have acted to stimulate the flow of assistance by public and private financial institutions. Efforts are being made to encourage foreign trade through studies of individual commodity problems aimed at reaching cooperative solutions wherever possible. All these measures are designed to raise the levels of inter-American cooperation to new highs.

As we join in this 69th anniversary of Pan-American Day, Mr. Speaker, let us remember that North and South America are bound together strategically, as well as economically and culturally. With international communism becoming ever more menacing, it is heartening to know that we are participants in the most solid international organization of free people anywhere in the world. I count it as a very great blessing to this country that we have so many friends in South and Central America, and I thank the gentlemen for yielding to me at this time.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Alabama for the splendid remarks he has made on Pan-American Day.

It was my good fortune to represent the House of Representatives of the United States at an international conference of representatives of legislative bodies of the Americas at Santiago, Chile on April 14, 1944, together with the late Honorable Pete Jarman, who then represented the Sixth District of Alabama. I am impressed with the coincidence that now, some 15 years later, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs is also the Representative of the Sixth Alabama District, Hon. ARMISTEAD I. SELDEN, JR.

Today, April 14, marks the date on which the resolution creating Pan-American Day was adopted in 1890 at the first International Conference of American States. For us in the New World it is a day peculiarly our own—the day of the Americas—when Americans both to the north and south can join hands to bring about a better understanding of one another, and cement hemispheric solidarity.

Painfully, with measured steps and in spite of many weaknesses and misunderstandings, the nations of the Americas have progressed along a weary road until now they clearly understand that while they are equal independent and sovereign nations, at the same time they are interdependent neighbors with similar problems.

As far back as 1810 the eminent Chilean Don Juan Egana made the first proposal for pan-American unity, forseeing with statesmanlike outlook the importance of unity of purpose and policy of the American Republics.

Many important steps have been taken to increase the effectiveness of the inter-American system and of course one of the greatest of these was the founding of the Pan American Union 68 years ago today.

Another was when President Hoover, 28 years ago, proclaimed April 14, 1931, as Pan-American day.

From a series of inter-American conferences a better understanding was brought about and the keystone for closer ties of friendship was the machinery set up for prompt consultation on matters of common concern.

In 1940 at Havana it was recognized an aggression of the territory or sovereignty of any nation in the Americas should be considered as an aggression against all.

These policies led ultimately to the Act of Chapultepec at Mexico City where it was agreed not only acts of aggression from without should be the concern of all, but also acts of aggression from within the hemisphere against another American State.

The United Nations at San Francisco recognized the importance of such regional arrangements by approving of such agreements in its charter just as the signers of the Act of Chapultepec recognized the United Nations by agreeing its activities should be "consistent with the purposes and principles of the general international organization."

So today the Americas have adopted a charter of their own to keep the peace. The 3,000-mile unfortified border between Canada and the United States, the towering figure of the Christ of the Andes high on the border between Chile and Argentina take on a new and added significance.

As I have indicated there have been many factors which have tended to bring about hemispheric security and to consolidate the ties of understanding and confraternity.

Among these is the fact that the Americas of all the areas of the world are best suited for geographical unity. Without the racial and historical prejudices of the Old World, they comprise an area equal to 25 percent of the globe—consisting of 12 million square miles of the richest and the most diversified resources of the world. Their climates and crops supplement each other which in and of itself draws the peoples of the hemisphere closer together and creates bonds of solidarity.

Just as we, in the years past, fought and died for our independence in the New World, so did the patriots of our neighbors to the south fight for the independence of their respective countries. This, too, provides a common bond of understanding as all these countries have heritages dedicated to the same ideals of independence of nations.

I need not add that in the fields of culture, music, art, and sciences there are great opportunities for progress, because contacts of this character ignore national borders and local differences.

It is significant that in the Americas alone of all the world there is no quota restrictions on immigration to this country.

While I have recited many instances of progress which we in the Americas have made in the past it does little good to blink the fact that there are still many problems to be solved.

The so-called good-neighbor policy is not dependent on any one administration for its execution. The good-neighbor policy is a continuing one. It is the universal desire of the vast majority of our people to have hemispheric unity for the betterment of us all—not just for the present, but as a permanent policy.

As has so well been said, let us improve the inter-American system and remember its interdependence is its foundation, cooperation is its keystone.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I join with the gentleman from Alabama in his fine remarks on pan-America. We people in the Western Hemisphere should stand firmly together in equal partnership. While we people have different cultures, and in many cases different economies, nevertheless it is the kind of area that makes for good friendly trading relationships. We in the United States should always recognize that the people in Latin and South America are our best customers. Good customers make good friends and good progress.

I want to welcome especially today my good friend, Rev. Joseph Thorning, who gave the prayer at the opening of today's session in the U.S. House of Representatives. We in the United States and the whole of North America, the Caribbean area, and South America know of his long interest and excellent efforts in developing the friendship of the countries and peoples of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. DADDARIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. DADDARIO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the gentleman from Alabama in his remarks on Pan-American Day.

The peoples of North and South America unite today in observing Pan-American Day, marking the establishment of the Pan American Union in 1890. The Pan American Union serves as the General Secretariat of the Organization of the American States and aids the 21 Republics of the Western Hemisphere by acting as an instrument of cooperative action.

Its scope of activity has expanded gradually in every field of international cooperation. The technical and information offices of the Union render even greater services to the governments and peoples of the Americas. The Union is responsible for furthering economic, social, and cultural relations among all the American states.

Even more than being the instrument of action, the Pan American Union is the symbol of the harmony and amity that exists among the American Republics. The Western Hemisphere is showing the world that all countries do not have to be separated from their neighbors by barbed wire or by guarded frontiers. It is proving that cooperation results in mutual benefit, for while the degree of collaboration and solidarity of the Union have been increased, the sovereignty and the territorial integrity of the Republics have also been strengthened.

The pan-American nations have manifested their desire and ability to settle problems peacefully and permanently. We must always be ready to give their problems sympathetic understanding of equal, if not paramount, importance among those problems which beset us. In the Pan American Union we have a magnificent meeting ground to discuss our mutual hopes and aspirations.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join the able and dedicated chairman of the Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, and my colleagues both on the full committee and on the Inter-American Subcommittee in taking advantage of this opportunity to express our sentiment of friendship for our sister Republics to the south.

It is well that annually on Pan-American Day we pause in our deliberation on legislative matters to give recognition to the hemispheric ties that bind us and expression of our faith in and our affection for our sister American Republics.

The best interest of the United States and of our sister Republics is in a hemispheric solidarity in which we work together in the realization that what is bad for us or any of our neighbors is bad for all.

Anything that adversely affects the economy of any of the Latin Republics will have repercussions on our own economy.

It is in our own self-interest as well as in the advancement of the true spirit of hemispheric solidarity for our country, to understand the economic problems of our sister Republics and to give such assistance in the solution of those problems as we would give to the economic problems of one of our own States.

Today we are just that close together that we cannot afford to become caloused and hardened to the needs of a hemispheric neighbor.

Every year the distance in time that separates us is being narrowed. Soon with the completion of the Inter-American Highway thousands of American families will be touring through Latin lands. They will be meeting the peoples of those lands and making personal friendships that more and more will bring us into understanding.

GOLDEN CENTURIES FOR AMERICA

Mr. Speaker, years before World War II even, speaking over the radio nightly, I sought to project myself into the future, and I saw the Americas lying between the death throes of Europe and the birth pains of the Orient. Then I saw ahead maybe 5, maybe 10 golden centuries, the centuries that will be known in history as the golden centuries of the American influence. That, I think, is coming to pass. The Orient, with its great natural resources, with its great multitude of people, as the centuries roll on may well take on the responsibility of world leadership. The influence of Europe, which was once a world influence, little by little is being diminished and will grow less as the years roll on. In between this gap of a dying Europe and an Orient aborning will be the golden centuries of history in which the American influence will be predominant. American influence means not the influence alone of the United States but the combined influence of all the American Republics. Not many years from now in Argentina and in Brazil may be an industry and a population surpassing our own.

If ever there was the call of destiny to unite the peoples of a hemisphere in a common mission together to serve mankind and lift it to higher plateaus, that call today is to us in the Americas, wherever by the will of providence we have been placed, in North, Central, or South America.

In the eternal revolving of the cycle of history has come to our hemisphere this mission. I repeat what I said at the commencement of these remarks, what is bad for any people on the American hemisphere is bad for all the other peoples of our hemisphere. What is good for 1 of the 21 Republics is good for all.

HEMISPHERIC UNDERSTANDING NEEDED

Unfortunately, there have been misunderstandings. Some of those misunderstandings we are responsible for, and some of those misunderstandings we are not responsible for.

But any time an American tourist goes into a Latin country and laughs at a local custom or makes fun at what local people are doing, the gulf of misunderstanding is being widened.

Every time we, conscious of our world responsibilities, give more attention to other parts of the world than we give to our sister Republics, we are contributing to the widening of that gulf.

I think it was fortunate that the Vice President went to South America. I think it was fortunate that those hostile demonstrations occurred, because nothing could have opened our eyes as those regrettable incidents have opened our eyes to the gulf of misunderstanding that was widening between our people and the peoples of Latin America.

If you take your neighbor for granted while you flirt with the stranger afar you may lose both the neighbor and the flirtation.

I wish to commend the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SELDEN], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for the energetic manner and the spirit in which he has taken hold of the responsibility that has come to him through the activities, the studies, and the counsel of his subcommittee, to narrow this gulf of misunderstanding and, indeed, to bring the United States and all the other republics on this continent into the fold of a real and an enduring brotherhood.

Mr. Speaker, this day I think will be the day on which the President will sign the bill introduced by my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES], which passed this House before the Easter vacation and which passed the other body on yesterday and has gone to the White House. I refer to the bill authorizing money to pay the traveling expenses of 2,000 athletes coming from Latin America to Chicago for the pan-American games. This being Pan-American Day I am hopeful that the President today will affix his signature to the bill that reflects the very spirit of this day.

HISTORY OF PAN AMERICANISM

Simon Bolivar, at the Congress of Panama in 1826, provided the impetus for the idea of pan-Americanism. It was largely through his efforts that the blueprint for the inter-American system was drawn. Various conferences since then have provided the foundation for the growth and expansion of the house of America. As the structure grew, the American Republics sought to promote peace, prosperity, and a better life for all Americans.

The Rio Pact providing for collective action to maintain security within the hemisphere has been an important factor in the maintenance of peace. Technical cooperation programs aimed at improving living standards, providing social welfare and contributing to economic development, have helped to advance prosperity throughout the Americas.

Examples of the benefits achieved under the technical cooperation program are noticed in the educational, health, and economic fields. Our sister Republics now have free, universal, and compulsory education. Progress on the control of disease and epidemics along with improved health services has raised health standards. The development of their natural resources and technical know-how has resulted in increased economic activity.

Along with all these benefits there is a constant effort, through information and cultural exchange programs, to strengthen the ties of understanding and respect amongst the American Republics. The exchange of students, scholars, and leaders; the translation and exchange of books; and tourist travel have served to strengthen the pan-American structure.

Nevertheless, despite these brief examples of hard work and good intentions that have gone into the development of the inter-American system, many problems still create discord in pan-American relations. The riots during Vice President NIXON'S visit to South America and more recently in Bolivia are indicative of the tensions that still exist.

It is mutually beneficial to Latin America and the United States that the differences that do exist between them be erased. Only through the understanding of each other's problems can the house of America remain sturdy.

OUR TRADE WITH LATIN AMERICA

No reasonable American will question the need for prosperous nations to the south. Furthermore, trade with our neighbors is essential for our own welfare. In 1957 our exports to Latin America amounted to $4.7 billion, second only to Western Europe, and our imports in 1958 were as high as $3.8 billion. In addition, Latin-American trade is essential for our military security as a source of strategic materials. This need for their markets and their strategic goods makes it essential that our trade with Latin America continue to flourish and expand.

No American will question the need for secure nations to the south. It was to assure this security that the Rio Pact, guaranteeing that any attack on any American state will be considered an attack upon all, and the Caracas resolution stating that the domination by international communism of the governments or political institutions of any American state is a threat to peace, were adopted.

The Communist threat requires constant vigilance for its techniques are subtle. Through various fronts, the Communists try to lull the people into complacency. Through these fronts and with Soviet financial aid, meetings at every governmental level are organized; travel to Communist countries is arranged; certain candidates are selected, trained, and indoctrinated and publications in all languages are distributed. It is estimated that 135 newspapers are Communist owned or stick to the party line; that approximately 100 hours a week of shortwave broadcasts come into Latin America; and that much TV time is bought to sell Red propaganda.

Accompanying the Communists' propaganda offensive has been a step-up in the economic offensive. The Soviet bloc is dangling the lure of vast markets at stable prices. Although Communist trade with Latin America presently represents only a little more than 1 percent of all our neighbors' trade, for the future it could constitute a potential threat to our security.

INTER-AMERICAN BANK

Conscious of all these problems that are disturbing to the inter-American system, the sister Republics are showing a determination to solve them. Recently the committee of 21 representing all the 21 Republics announced the agreement on the formation of a regional bank to make resources available for various economic projects. The United States also announced it was ready to expand technical cooperation in Latin America and hopes to extend reciprocal trade agreements with the Republics. In addition, the idea of some sort of a regional Latin American market, similar to the European Common Market and Free Trade Area—with the hope of reducing fluctuations in price of primary commodities—has been discussed.

Another constructive idea, aimed at increasing the standard of living in the Latin American countries, was recently advanced by former Costa Rican Ambassador Gonzales Facio to the Organization of American States. Facio stated that since the region is largely protected from aggression by the United States, the Latin American States should consider the possibility of disarmament. His plan aimed at trimming the arms budgets of these countries and diverting the money saved to beneficial public projects, thereby aiding the development of one of the richest underdeveloped areas in the world.

All these attempts to solve some of the problems that are confronting the pan-American nations is indicative of their desire to solidify the foundation of the house of America.

It is especially appropriate on Pan-American Day that the United States and Latin America resolve that they will attempt to solve their difficulties in a spirit of mutual trust. As Dr. Eisenhower concluded in his report after his survey of the situation, Americans should make an effort to understand the problems, hopes, and desires of their southern neighbors. On the other hand, the peoples and governments of Latin America should try to become aware of the reasons for United States programs, policies and attitudes.

It is only through mutual understanding that fruitful cooperation can be attained. Once this is accomplished, there is no limit to the future progress and strength of the pan-American system.

On this Pan-American Day may the call of destiny to this hemisphere to its mission for mankind be heard in this land and in all the lands of our American hemisphere.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD].

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, when a person goes to a foreign land, either for a visit or to live, the first impression is of the things that are different. Customs are different, languages are different, traditions are different, sometimes the color of the skin is different. These are the things that stand out.

During the 10 years I lived in a foreign country, the biggest lesson I learned was that "different" is not the same as "worse." I looked the two words up one time in the dictionary and they are not synonymous. A thing can be different without necessarily being worse. Sometimes I think the English word that causes more trouble in the world than any other is the four-letter word "only." "This is our way—ergo, it is the only way." Now, it is a good way, we like it, we are proud of it, but it is not necessarily the only good way. Sometimes we create animosity around the world or alienate others largely because, with all good intentions, we are so sure of our way being the best or the only way that we give the impression of failing to appreciate that other folks are just as justifiably and properly proud of their way as we are of ours.

But as one continues to live in the other country, what one becomes more and more conscious of are not the things that are different, but the things that are alike; the deep things, the love of home and of family and of country, pride of culture, and the desire that things will be better for their children tomorrow than they are today. These are the same all around the world.

There is no better demonstration of this than here in the Western Hemisphere. The things on which we agree and the interests that unite us far outweigh the differences and the things that divide. There is no better example of the capacity of peoples with different backgrounds and cultures and traditions to live together in good will and mutual respect and cooperaton for the benefit of all. The unities are deeper and broader based than the difficulties that arise from time to time. There is more to be happy about in the relations between our countries than there is to be embarrassed or upset about.

Actually, we can be proud of the behavior of both sides. First, we can be proud of the overall record of our country in the Western Hemisphere.

We could have seized control or imposed our will on the hemisphere at almost any time in the last 150 years, but we never did. We declared a policy that guaranteed the independence of the American States from external domination, including our own domination, and we stuck to it. It was not a Democratic or a Republican policy; it was a U.S. policy. No matter what party was in power, Latin America knew, and the whole world knew, that the United States would not permit any European systems or sovereignties to establish themselves in the Western Hemisphere.

With all the mistakes that we freely admit have been made, mistakes due more to oversight or neglect than to action or to intent, the basic record of the United States is one in which we can take satisfaction.

Equally we can pay tribute to and be proud of the record of the Latin American countries. It is much harder to be the smaller brother than to be the bigger one. On the whole, these countries have exhibited great maturity and understanding, sometimes under difficult circumstances and despite irritating provocations. This demonstration of giving first importance to the fundamental likenesses and common concerns is the best assurance of steadily improving relations in the future—deeper understanding and greater cooperation in working for the things that are in the best interests of all of us.

I commend my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the fine leadership which, as has already been said here, he has been giving to his Subcommittee on the Western Hemisphere. When it has sometimes been neglected by us a bit, it was not deliberate, but in a sense constituted a compliment to the Latin American nations. It evidenced that we had every confidence in their friendship and understanding and steadfastness, just as we expected them to have confidence also in ours. But even in your own family things go better if you do not take your loved ones too much for granted. They know that you are loyal and devoted to them, but they like it better if you take pains to reaffirm your attitude every once in a while.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to take advantage of Pan American Day and every occasion that comes along to speak out in behalf of the good things that stand out in our hemisphere—the unbreakable ties of common interest, of loyalty, and of common dedication to the basic values of freedom and democracy. Those are the things that we can rightly emphasize. They are even stronger today than in the past. The very fact that more of the smaller countries will speak up right to our face about matters where they believe we are in the wrong, is a sign of better relations, not of deteriorating relations.

I look forward to the next decade as the best in the history of our hemisphere. We are going to try our best to achieve that, and I know the wonderful group of fine people most of us have been privileged to meet from Latin America are going to try their best. Together we will continue to make headway toward this goal of a really solid, united hemisphere.

Mr. SELDEN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I join in the remarks which have been said today in supporting further friendship between our country and the other Americas. I want to commend the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, for introducing this resolution and bringing it to the attention of the House.

Also I think it is interesting to note that our session today was begun with a prayer delivered by Father Joseph Thorning, who has an international reputation as a man who has done much to bring about a greater relationship between our countries, North, Central, and South America. His great work has been recognized. I think, too, it is interesting to note this is the 15th year in which he has participated so magnificently in bringing this to the attention of our people.

Mr. SELDEN. I thank the gentleman from Florida, and I join with him in commending the very fine work that has been done by Father Joseph Thorning in promoting inter-American solidarity.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have been participating in these Pan-American ceremonies ever since I have been in the House. I may add that I am glad to see Father Thorning, the Padre of the Americas, appear for the ceremonies for his 15th year. The overtones of the program today are what impress me.

This is not merely a flow of platitudes and flowery phases, vis-a-vis Latin America today. We generally have the impression that this whole thing is a sort of musical comedy or operetta on a stage with the hot cha cha and mambos with strange characters in straw hats—and that has been unfortunate. Today, obviously, we are alarmed—we are concerned—we are aware that in the Caribbean and in Central and South America there is a dangerous and a serious and a vital and an important problem economically, diplomatically, spiritually, and in every other way. This program today under the leadership of our distinguished friend, the gentleman from Alabama is focusing the attention of the people of the hemisphere and all the world on the fact that the United States of America is adult and with maturity is now embracing an awareness of the real problems between our two peoples and the peoples of North and South America.

Mr. Speaker, today, as the storm clouds gather over the Caribbean areas, Pan-American Day assumes a greater significance in the history of all three Americas. It emphasizes anew the necessity for viewing the present ominous events, then, not as isolated incidents, but in the perspective of historical knowledge.

In that light, we should recall that of the various important leaders of this hemisphere, one of the first to recognize the importance of that area and to take an active interest in the idea of an interoceanic canal was Simon Bolivar, the great liberator.

In a famous "Letter to a Jamaican" in 1815 he expressed his desire for a canal at the Isthmus of Panama, predicting that—

> That magnificent portion [of America] situated between the two oceans will in time become the emporium of the universe. Its canals will shorten the distances of the world and will strengthen the commercial ties of Europe, America, and Asia.

It was only natural, Mr. Speaker, that when Bolivar became President of his country that he should bring about, on June 22, 1826, at the Isthmus of Panama the first Inter-American Conference of Nations, at which the canal idea was a point of discussion.

Now, more than 130 years later, we have seen some of his major dreams come true—a mark of the vision of this great pan-American leader. He and his ideas stand out more clearly than ever.

Mr. SELDEN. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate our good and distinguished friend from Alabama and associate myself with the gentleman from Alabama and others who have thought well to say something today in behalf of the remembrance of Pan-American Day.

There is no question that we have a responsibility to our neighbors to the south. I think it is significant to report, and I do not think it has been said today, that the per capita income of the people of Latin America per year is only $126. It has been said that communism feeds on the bellies of the hungry. We have an abundance that we might share with the undernourished of Latin America. We might think seriously of ways to do this. Our pan-American friends have tremendous resources both natural resources and the resources of the people of South America that are untapped today. I think we, today, can pause and think well how we might in America help these people tap their own resources for the betterment of their own society which, in turn, would serve to make better the society of all of us in the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. SELDEN. I thank the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BECKER. Mr. Speaker, I was delighted today to be on the floor to hear the opening prayer by my good friend, Father Joseph F. Thorning, and to hear his words of prayer for Latin American and pan-American friendship. While I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SELDEN] and those of the gentleman from California [Mr. JACKSON], both of them have so well covered the many reasons for better understanding of the American countries, thereby further solidifying the spirit of friendship that is so vital in these times.

However, I would like to divert for a few moments to say a few words about Father Thorning, who has spent almost a lifetime studying and promoting friendly relations in the Pan American Union. Father Thorning studied in the universities of Latin America and has written books and articles on Latin America. He has been awarded the highest national decorations of other American Republics. He also holds the two highest decorations of Portugal and Spain and has always pointed out the value and importance of the mother countries in promoting the cause of friendship in the new world.

Due to the fact that Father Thorning has traveled through all the countries of Latin and South America and is well known for his great work among the people, he has been recognized by many countries and has been one of the greatest ambassadors of goodwill. On several occasions, particularly in the years of 1951 and 1956, he was officially appointed as a U.S. representative to inaugurations of South American Presidents.

I sincerely hope that he will live for many long years and be able to continue his great efforts in bringing about closer friendship and understanding with our neighbors to the south.

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Speaker, as one who was born in Argentina and who lived there for more than half my life, I think it is important that we recognize the commemoration of Pan-American Day today by recalling the purposes for which the Organization of American States was created.

This great organization, oldest and most successful international union in the world, was established by the member states to achieve an order of peace and justice, to promote their solidarity, to strengthen their collaboration, and to defend their sovereignty, their territorial integrity, and their independence.

Those were the reasons for the birth of the organization when it came into being on April 14, 1890.

They are the same reasons why it is more urgent than ever before that the nations of the Organization of American States stand together.

It is more necessary than ever before that there is cooperation between these great states of the Western Hemisphere, that there is a strengthening of their relations in support of democracy.

All of the American nations are sovereign nations, born in an historical mold similar to that of the United States. And they have many historical, economic, and cultural interests in common.

We must not permit a wedge to be driven between our respective countries by those seeking the destruction of democracy.

We must, in commemorating the creation of this union so many years ago, rededicate ourselves to the ideals on which our basic foundations of freedom long have rested.

This union between the pan-American States is not a perfect one and there are few who would claim it to be so.

As one personally familiar with the history, the customs, the traditions and the language of our Latin neighbors, I urge the United States to regard them and their problems with the recognition they deserve.

We Americans must, I feel, give greater attention to the betterment of the social and economic status of our friends to our south.

In these perilous days, we must remember the underlying principles of the Organization of American States as stated in the charter of the OAS:

1. To strengthen the peace and security of the continent;

2. To prevent possible causes of difficulties and to insure the pacific settlement of disputes that may arise among the member states;

3. To provide for common action on the part of those states in the event of aggression;

4. To seek the solution of political, juridical, and economic problems that may arise among them; and

5. To promote, by cooperative action, their economic, social and cultural development.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, as April 14 commemorates a day in 1890 when the Organization of the American States was born, we celebrate it as a birthday. It is far more than a commemoration. Like other birthdays, it is also a beginning, the opening of another year of promise and expectation. The now many years of promise and expectation have been amply fulfilled. The effect has, moreover, been cumulative. As each year of harmony and cooperative achievement is added to the others of this remarkable Organization, its service to itself, to the 21 American Republics of which it is constituted, and to the world is increased, and multiplied.

BEGAN AS PAN AMERICAN UNION 69 YEARS AGO

This Organization began as the International Bureau of the Republics. For many years it grew and thrived as the Pan American Union. Under its appellation since 1948, as the Organization of American States, it has indeed reached maturity. Now in the 69th year of its admirable existence, it is the outward manifestation and practical realization of an ideal of international cooperation. The 21 American Republics have joined in voluntary union for the purpose of achieving an order of peace and justice; of maintaining friendship and security; of promoting close relations and constructive cooperation; while defending, withal, the sovereignty, the territorial integrity, and the independence of the 21 individual nations.

MUTUAL BENEFITS FOR 21 REPUBLICS AND THE WORLD

They joined for these purposes; they have faithfully pursued them; and there is continuing, gratifying achievement. The practical evidence of the accomplishment of these ideals appears in a multitude of forms. A series of conferences—usually known as the pan-American conferences—has, over the years, been the source of resolutions for expanding the activities of the Organization and creating means of effectuating them. Other special and technical conferences have been sponsored by the Organization to carry out its purposes. Technical and information offices have been set up at the headquarters of the Organization in Washington and serve as a fountain for similar offices throughout the Republics organized to promote cooperation in agriculture, foreign trade, travel, in statistical, cultural, labor, judicial, social, and various sorts of technical information; and to stimulate knowledge of and interest in the numerous American neighbors. The maintenance of these methods and devices of coordinating service are not only of mutual benefit to themselves. These cooperative activities are of significant value both in effect and as an exemplar to worldwide relationships.

Our dedication of this day to pan-American solidarity is an expression of gratification in achievement and faith in the future constructive cooperation of the 21 American Republics.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, it is an event unique in human history when 21 sovereign nations set aside 1 day each year, and proclaim that day as the symbol of their desire to live in peace with one another. We are privileged to celebrate that event today, the 69th anniversary of the Pan American Union.

But as we all know, this day has a meaning which goes beyond mere intentions for goodwill—for the 21 American Republics have achieved this close union only after generations of attempt and repeated failure. And as we all know, that which is accomplished after long hard work is much more treasured than something gained too easily, and without sacrifice. The first dreams of the day we celebrate today are more than a century and a quarter old. They were the visions of the great South American liberator, Bolivar, who as far back as 1826 conceived of the idea of a union of the democracies of the Western Hemisphere. He hoped for an organization in which "the strength of all would come to the aid of anyone which might suffer from the aggression of a foreign enemy."

That idea failed then, and it failed several times again. But finally, despite years of internal strife, the vision of an American family of nations achieved fruition. As a result of a conference held in Washington in 1890, the foundations for the Pan American Union were laid. In the years since that time, there has been steady progress in building the mighty union we have today. Especially in the last 25 years, since our own country inaugurated the good neighbor policy, Bolivar's vision of a Pan American Union has flourished. We are honored to celebrate the event today, and we salute the body which implements the vision—the Organization of American States.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. THORNBERRY]. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROHIBITING PAYMENT OF ANNUITIES AND RETIRED PAY TO OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE UNITED STATES IN CASES INVOLVING NATIONAL SECURITY

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up the resolution (H. Res. 238) providing for the consideration of H.R. 4601, a bill to amend the act of September 1, 1954, in order to limit to cases involving the national security the prohibition on payment of annuities and retired pay to officers and employees of the United States, to clarify the application and operation of such act, and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4601) to amend the Act of September 1, 1954, in order to limit to cases involving the national security the prohibition on payment of annuities and retired pay to officers and employees of the United States, to clarify the application and operation of such Act, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of my remarks I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 238 makes in order the consideration of H.R. 4601, to amend the act of September 1, 1954, in order to limit to cases involving the national security the prohibition on payment of annuities and retired pay to officers and employees of the United States, to clarify the application and operation of such act, and for other purposes. This resolution provides for an open rule and 1 hour of debate.

The general purpose of this legislation is twofold:

First. This legislation continues in full force and effect the prohibitions now contained in the act of September 1, 1954, as amended, against payment of any Federal annuity or retired pay on the basis of the service of any individual who has committed an offense involving the national security of the United States.

Second. This legislation restores certain Federal retirement benefits, including survivor benefits, which under the existing provisions of the act of September 1, 1954, have been denied to a number of individuals not because of the commission by such individuals of offenses involving the national security but because of the commission by them of comparatively minor offenses which are in no way related to the national security.

The primary purpose of the act of September 1, 1954, as originally enacted, was to prohibit the payment of any Federal annuity or retired pay to any individual because of the commission by such individual of an offense involving the national security of the United States. However, such act, in its entirety and as now in effect, contains provisions which exceed this purpose and have resulted in the denial of Federal retirement benefits to certain individuals and their survivors for reasons which are not related to the primary purpose of such act. This bill will remedy that situation. This legislation was submitted by the U.S. Civil Service Commission as an official legislative proposal of the administration.

I urge the adoption of House Resolution 238.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I yield back my time.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4601) to amend the act of September 1, 1954, in order to limit to cases involving the national security the prohibition on payment of annuities and retired pay to officers and employees of the United States, to clarify the application and operation of such act, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 4601, with Mr. EVINS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MURRAY] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may desire.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation was introduced at the official request of the U.S. Civil Service Commission to accomplish two major purposes.

First. The bill clarifies and strengthens existing provisions of law which are designed to bar payment of Federal annuities or retirement pay to persons who have committed certain offenses relating to questions of loyalty to the United States or the national security.

Second. The bill corrects certain inequities arising under provisions of existing law which have had the effect of denying Federal annuities or retirement pay to many persons because of relatively minor offenses in no way related to loyalty or the national security. This latter class of persons already had paid full and adequate penalties prescribed by law for their offenses, only to be faced thereafter with the additional burden of losing valuable retirement benefits.

The dual purpose of H.R. 4601 is carried out by language in the bill amending Public Law 769, 83d Congress, in its entirety. This law bars payment of any Federal annuity or retired pay to individuals who are convicted of certain criminal offenses or who fail or refuse to testify or produce records, or make false statements, relating to their official duties in proceedings before judicial or legislative tribunals. The bar against payment applies indiscriminately to both security and nonsecurity cases. It extends to surviving widows and children as well as the individuals concerned.

In submitting the request for this legislation, the Civil Service Commission pointed out that on July 16, 1958, the U.S. Court of Claims held section 2 of Public Law 769 unconstitutional as it relates to the case of one Max Steinberg, whose annuity had been terminated because of his invoking protection of the fifth amendment in refusing to testify before a grand jury on a nonsecurity matter. The Department of Justice advises that the Supreme Court of the United States will not be asked to review this decision.

Of special concern to our committee is the fact that without this legislation it could be that Public Law 769, in its present form, would not be effective to deny Federal annuities and retired pay to individuals whose offenses do involve the national security. This legislation, therefore, continues and clarifies the bar to Federal annuities and retirement pay in cases of wrongful acts or improper failure to act in matters involving the national security or questions of loyalty to the United States. It is believed that these cases are in such a special category that payment of annuities to offenders in this area would be repugnant to public policy and offensive to the ordinary individual's sense of justice. By their offenses against the national security they have forfeited all right to any Federal retirement benefits.

The bill which the Committee recommends amends Public Law 769, 83d, Congress, in its entirety so as to limit its application to matters involving the national security. It extends the annuity bar to a limited number of additional loyalty offenses which were omitted from that law.

The bill would retroactively remove the bar against annuity awards in postal depredation and similar cases. This would have the effect of automatically reopening and allowing the annuity claims already denied for other than security reasons. Any contributions refunded to individuals in these cases would have to be redeposited.

During the operation of Public Law 769, a number of very inequitable situations have developed whereby individuals have been severely punished by loss of valuable civil service annuities for relatively small infractions of the law having nothing to do with security. Most of these infractions occurred prior to the enactment of Public Law 769. The existing criminal laws already provide for suitable punishment, consisting of fines, imprisonment, or both, in these cases.

The Civil Service Commission reports that 166 persons have had their civil service annuities revoked as a result of Public Law 769, but that only 11 of these cases have any relation to security matters. The 11 individuals would continue to be barred from receiving annuities under H.R. 4601.

This bill was recommended unanimously by our committee. Its enactment will carry out the primary purpose of the original legislation, that is, to prohibit the payment of any Federal annuity or retired pay to any individual who commits an offense involving the national security of the United States.

The legislation, in its present form, should stand any court test since it is limited to offenses against the national security. In our opinion, payment of Federal retirement benefits to offenders in such cases would be shocking to the public conscience and morals and contrary to the high principles on which our Government is founded.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge favorable action on this legislation in the interest of the Government, from the standpoint of our national security policy, and in the interest of doing equity for individuals who, although guilty of no act or omission affecting the national security, have lost or will lose their retirement benefits under existing law.

This law, which was enacted in 1954 and which the present legislation modifies, was passed as a result of the conviction of one Alger Hiss. At the time the legislation was considered by our committee, Alger Hiss who had been convicted of perjury in connection with national defense matters, was in a Federal prison but was soon to be released from prison.

Our committee felt very strongly that Alger Hiss who had betrayed our national security when he occupied a high position in our Government should be denied the opportunity of receiving benefits in the form of annuities from our Government. For that reason the legislation was passed in 1954, but, frankly, the legislation went too far. It covered offenses not only involving our national security, but covered all kinds of offense crimes which violate the criminal laws of our Government, so far as theft and mishandling of the mails and embezzlement and many other offenses which in no way involved the national security of our Government.

As I have already stated, 166 persons have been deprived of their annuity as a result of the operation of this act which was passed in 1954. Of those 166 cases only 11 involved the national security of our country. I have here a list of all the annuitants who have been denied their annuities since the passage of Public Law 769 in 1954—125 of the 166 were postal employees. This list prepared by the Civil Service Commission indicates the different crimes for which these employees were convicted and on account of which they were denied their annuity. Most of these consisted of offenses like theft of the mails, using the mail to defraud, and embezzlement, and they were in no way related to national security or loyalty to our Government.

Your committee feels there has been an injustice to these persons who are being deprived of their annuity and who have not violated any laws respecting loyalty or the national security of our country. We do not think these people should be so penalized in this manner. This bill would restore to all of them their annuities retroactively to the time they were entitled to same, less any amount they have withdrawn.

There was no opposition to this legislation in our committee. It is meritorious. I trust it will be passed unanimously.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. I think everybody on this floor has no respect for anyone who pleads the fifth amendment.

The fifth amendment is pleaded in order not to disclose what the defense is or what the crime might be on the theory that nobody has to testify against himself. My question is, Does this act permit people who pleaded the fifth amendment to get their full pension rights, or are they excluded, as they should be? I favor the passage of the bill, but I certainly do not want to put into business these fifth-amendment guys again.

Mr. MURRAY. If it concerns the national security or loyalty laws of our country, then they would be barred.

Mr. FULTON. How can you tell if it will affect the national security when these particular individuals plead the fifth amendment in order not to disclose and not testify? Why not have an amendment that bars anybody from getting these benefits under this legislation if he has pleaded the fifth amendment to prevent disclosure of what the crime might be?

Mr. MURRAY. I do not agree with the gentleman. If he refuses to testify about any matter involving national security or loyalty to the United States, then he would be covered by this legislation.

Mr. FULTON. How do you know that he is not involved in something that is against the security of the United States of America, because he clams up and refuses to testify and pleads the fifth amendment as a bar?

Mr. MURRAY. Because the very questions propounded to him which he refuses to answer would show they involve the national security laws of our country.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. JOHANSEN. With respect to the question raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is it not obvious that the line of questions relating to which the witness invoked the fifth amendment would clearly indicate whether the matter related to national security or matters of loyalty?

Mr. MURRAY. Certainly so. And, I refer to the Steinberg case which was before the United States Court of Claims. In that case Max Steinberg was asked a question which did not involve national security or the laws of our country, and later on he was deprived of his annuity, and the Court of Claims held he should not have been. He refused to answer questions which did not involve jeopardizing our national security.

Mr. FULTON. Suppose that you have a witness on the stand before a court and the question comes up, "What is your name?" "Where do you live?" "Where were you born?" and the man says "I refuse to answer on the ground it might incriminate me," and pleads the fifth amendment. Now, what happens?

Mr. MURRAY. That question does not relate to national security. He would have to be asked a question specifically relating to the national security laws of our country and then refuse to answer.

Mr. FULTON. Has the court held it was unconstitutional simply on the point of the fifth amendment rather than on the point of national security?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding in the case before the courts that the chairman of the committee referred to it was so specifically ruled that this legislation was unconstitutional with respect to the invoking of the fifth amendment in a matter relating to an internal revenue investigation. Is that not the statement which the chairman made?

Mr. MURRAY. That is correct, sir.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Now, may I ask a further question of the chairman. Is it not correct, Mr. Chairman, that the purpose of our committee in voting this bill out and the purpose and intent of the bill as specifically framed is in no way to repeal, to weaken, to modify, but on the contrary the purpose and intent is to strengthen the provisions of present legislation which relates to national security and to matters of loyalty?

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman is entirely correct. Of course, after the conviction of Alger Hiss for perjuring himself, in connection with "clamming up" about certain secrets he had given to foreign agents who were trying to destroy our country, we felt that this legislation should be passed.

But at that time there was great hysteria in the country, and there was great wrath upon the part of the public against Alger Hiss' receiving an annuity when he was discharged from the penitentiary. But I must say now that the legislation went too far and covered not only the case of Alger Hiss and all those who had done violence to our national security and in matters of loyalty, but included as well offenses like theft from the mails, and so forth, which in no way related to our national security. So that is the purpose of this legislation, to confine the matter solely to questions of loyalty and national security.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Is not the intent of this legislation, and of the legislative committee and of the Congress further attested to by the fact that there have been introduced into this House bills to repeal this legislation outright, and by the action of the committee in refusing to act favorably upon those bills we have further clarified our intent to strengthen the legislation on the books relative to questions of national security and matters of loyalty?

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions to ask in connection with the observation of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. As a member of the committee I am in favor of H.R. 4601, but a couple of questions arise in my mind. I have in my hand a copy of the original act, which is now up for amendment, and in section 2 I invite the Chairman's attention and the attention of the other members of the committee, to this language in section 2283 of title 5 of the United States Code:

> There shall not be paid to any person who has failed or refused, or fails or refuses, prior to, on, or after September 1, 1954, upon the ground of self-incrimination—

And then the provision continues—> to appear, testify, or produce any book.

Turning now to page 8 of the proposed amendment, section 2(a), beginning on line 13, we find reads as follows:

> There shall not be paid to any person who, prior to, on, or after September 1, 1954, has refused or refuses,

The language "upon the ground of self-incrimination" has been eliminated from the proposed amendment. But my question now pertains to page 7 of the report in support of this bill where it says in the first paragraph:

> Section 2 of the amendment is in two parts, as in the case of the first section, because of the necessity to include in this legislation certain security and loyalty offenses not covered by existing law.

It is the next paragraph which is significant:

> Section 2(a) of the amendment prohibits annuities or retired pay to persons refusing, on grounds of self-incrimination, to testify or produce documents, in proceedings relating to loyalty, or with respect to their relations with foreign governments. This continues present law, except as to offenses not involving loyalty.

The question I have is this. In view of the fact that this amendment proposes, as I understand it does, to delete the self-incrimination language as it does, I am at a loss to understand why in the report it states that there will be forfeiture of annuities or retired pay when an annuitant exercises his privilege under the fifth amendment. It is my understanding, under the Steinberg case—and I am now reading from the Steinberg decision in the U.S. Court of Claims, decided July 16, 1958, where on the constitutional question the court held:

> The offense in the case at bar was the action of plaintiff in invoking the fifth amendment. This, rather than an offense, is a constitutional guarantee. Thus does the taking of the fifth amendment constitute a breach of faith for which Congress can enact legislation providing for a sanction against improper practices of its officers and employees? We think not.

My question is this: Are we not, in adopting this amendment, eliminating any sanction or any penalty for the invocation of the constitutional guarantee under the fifth amendment? Or are we continuing the sanction or penalty which the Court of Claims has struck down as unconstitutional?

Mr. MURRAY. I do not think so, because in the Steinberg case no question of national security or loyalty was concerned. He was not asked a question about national security or about loyalty or about his conduct in connection therewith.

Mr. FOLEY. Is it our intention then to eliminate by means of this proposed amendment, H.R. 4601, any sanction that would be applied upon the exercise of the fifth amendment?

Mr. MURRAY. No, except as it relates to national security or to loyalty.

Mr. FOLEY. In other words, if a Government employee is called before a grand jury or a court or a committee of Congress and invokes the fifth amendment, that particular Government employee would not lose his annuity rights? Is that correct?

Mr. MURRAY. No. If it involves national security or loyalty, if it is a question like that, and he refuses to answer, then he would be subject to this act.

Mr. FOLEY. If he does invoke the fifth amendment under that circumstance he would suffer the loss of his annuity?

Mr. MURRAY. That is correct, as long as he refuses to answer any question concerning the national security or loyalty on his part.

Mr. FOLEY. Or if he is called before a committee or a grand jury in an inquiry into a national security or loyalty matter, and if this Government employee then invokes the protection of the fifth amendment, the mere fact that he invokes the protection of the fifth amendment would be a ground for forfeiting, canceling, and terminating his annuity rights. Is that correct?

Mr. MURRAY. As I understand, if it concerns the national security or loyalty as far as he is personally concerned.

Mr. FOLEY. Is not that position then in conflict with the position of the Court of Claims?

Mr. MURRAY. Not at all, because the Steinberg case was not based upon national security or loyalty. It did not pertain to national security or loyalty. Also, the Steinberg case was not appealed—one reason being this pending legislation which would have made the question moot.

Mr. FOLEY. The Steinberg case involved the invocation of the fifth amendment, a constitutional guarantee.

Mr. MURRAY. That is correct, but he was not asked about any matters involving him in connection with our national security and our loyalty.

Mr. FULTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to comment on what the gentleman from Maryland has been bringing up here because it is a real point. If there is one method different from another in the exercise of the fifth amendment by a defendant, I should like to know it.

On the rule that if you plead the fifth amendment you plead the fifth amendment, that is pleaded for a loyalty purpose or a purpose that is criminal under a statute, I see no difference in the pleading of the fifth amendment, so I cannot see why in one case it is unconstitutional according to the Court of Claims when it is done for a personal, private reason and would then be constitutional when it is done for a loyalty reason or a security reason.

The next point is this: Obviously there has been no decision of the U.S. Supreme Court on this subject at all. We are simply guessing what the final appeal would be, because the decision has only been in the lower court, in the Steinberg case in the Court of Claims.

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON] can speak against the bill on his own time, but not on my time.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I think the distinguished chairman of our committee has clearly explained the purposes of this legislation. This bill comes before this Committee with the unanimous approval of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Let me say, too, that it comes to you after long consideration and deliberation.

Our chairman has well said that about all there is to this legislation is that we went a little further than we intended to in the original legislation. It deals primarily with the question of national security and loyalty, and not so much with other subject matters that have been brought into this discussion today.

Briefly stated, this legislation is desirable to eliminate injustices resulting from denial of retirement benefits, under present law, to many individuals—and widows of some—for relatively minor offenses which do not involve questions of loyalty or the national security. At the same time, enactment of this legislation will clarify and strengthen the very desirable bar, intended to be provided by existing law, against payment of Federal retirement benefits to individuals who have committed offenses—or who have failed or refused to act when in duty bound—in loyalty or security matters.

To accomplish this twofold purpose, the bill completely rewrites Public Law 769, 83d Congress. That law was enacted for the primary purpose of prohibiting Federal retirement benefits for individuals guilty of wrongful acts or omissions in matters affecting the national security. The law was enacted in response to strong and widespread public demand. This demand arose because of the then pending payment of a civil service retirement annuity to an individual about to be released from a Federal penitentiary after serving a penal term for perjury before a Federal grand jury in a proceeding directly involving the national security. The entire country was deeply disturbed and indignant at the prospect that a Federal annuity could be paid in any such case.

I should say that the individual in question has not yet applied for the retirement benefits; but if he should apply, there will surely be a question as to whether he can collect. He has left the country, and I do not believe that any Member of this body would want to pay retirement benefits to an individual who decides to reside in a foreign country.

Although this was the primary purpose of the law, during the consideration of the legislation a number of additional offenses were written into the provision barring annuities. Many of these additional offenses in no manner relate to the national security. It appears clear at this time that the denial of annuities in these additional cases was above and beyond the primary purpose of Public Law 769 and should be stricken from the law in equity and good conscience.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that H.R. 4601 continues, clarifies, and strengthens the original purpose of Public Law 769, that is, to bar Federal annuities and retired pay in cases of offenses against the national security. The decision of the Court of Claims in Steinberg against the United States declared section 2 of Public Law 769 unconstitutional in a matter relating to the invoking of the fifth amendment before a grand jury investigating a nonsecurity matter. Unless the security provisions of the law are strengthened, similar judicial decisions well might be handed down in the future declaring the entire present law unconstitutional.

H.R. 4601 removes the inequitable provisions of Public Law 769 by restoring all annuity rights in nonsecurity cases. The restoration is retroactive and will take effect as though Public Law 769 never had been enacted. Anyone who has received a refund of contributions to an annuity or retirement system will have to redeposit the refund to obtain restoration of benefits. In this connection, it is to be noted that many of the annuities which will be restored were denied for comparatively minor offenses. In many cases, no penalty was applied due to mitigating circumstances such as restitution, good records, and so forth. In a number of instances, the offenders were reemployed and rendered long and faithful public service, only to be denied annuities when they reached retirement age.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. FULTON. Why, if pleading the fifth amendment is not an offense in itself, is one kind of pleading of the fifth amendment invoked to have your retirement benefits canceled? On the record I would like to say if one is unconstitutional or one method of pleading the fifth amendment provides an unconstitutional result as to retirement benefits under this act, I think the second, although we like it less, will likewise result in an unconstitutional decision if it is sustained.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. FOLEY. I would like to associate myself with the conclusion reached by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and say that if it is unconstitutional for one purpose, it is unconstitutional for all purposes and that there cannot be a line drawn, and whatever may be our personal feelings in the matter if the matter is a constitutional right, it is a constitutional right, in my humble judgment, for all purposes.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. JOHANSEN. I would like to observe first of all that the question of what is or what is not constitutional seems in these latter days to be whatever the decision of a majority of the nine men across the street happens to be. Now, Mr. Chairman, does not the question amount to this—not whether there is a right to invoke the fifth amendment, but whether there is a right, a constitutional right to hold a job under an oath of loyalty to the Constitution and in the Federal Government and then refuse to give an accounting of one's performance of that job with respect to matters that involve national security and that involve loyalty to this Government and to the very oath that was taken. Is not the real issue whether or not we are going to make a constitutional right out of a Federal job without reference to willingness to testify as to the most basic responsibility of all, namely, that of loyalty to the Government and to the very oath that is taken?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I think the gentleman has stated the proposition correctly.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. FULTON. Would you explain to me—because that does bring up a question—if a citizen of the United States exercises his constitutional right, by what right or authority then does this Congress put a penalty on it?

Mr. JOHANSEN. I would point out, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, that the loss of the job would certainly be a penalty and the loss of the perquisites and privileges of the job, of which this pension is one, is, let us concede for all practical purposes, a penalty; but the question is whether the right to that job and to these perquisites is a constitutional right that is completely inviolate whether or not a person violates national security or refuses to answer questions related to his own performance in that office.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DOYLE. I had not prepared to make any remarks in connection with this bill, for which I will gladly vote. But I think perhaps the subject of pleading the fifth amendment by a witness comes before the House Committee on Un-American Activities more than any other committee of this House. Therefore, in view of the discussion about it, now in process, I might contribute a thought or so which might be helpful, and for the problem. In the first place, may I say, that the Supreme Court of the United States time and again has held that the pleading of the fifth amendment, by a witness before a congressional committee, does not even infer guilt or wrongdoing. It does not even infer guilt and is definitely not an admission of guilt; not of any kind or sort of guilt of criminal activity.

Mr. REES of Kansas. This legislation does not affect that.

Mr. DOYLE. But I wish to associate myself with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON] and the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FOLEY] on the question they have raised, as to the constitutionality of the bill provisions in the fifth amendment. Of course, I am strongly in support of the bill. I hope this method of trying to strengthen our national security proves practical and legal. I compliment the committee upon its work on the problem. But, I think we ought to be dead sure that this bill, as it passes this House, is fully considered by the other body and possibly in conferences, as to this particular point being discussed. I doubt very much if by this congressional legislation we can overcome many, many decisions of our Supreme Court which has so many times defined that the plea of self incrimination, known as the fifth amendment, is a basic constitutional right.

May I say this, and I say it with all due respect to the members of the committee: that I am one Member of this Congress who recognizes, that even though I may not like some of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Supreme Court of the United States is the Supreme Court of the United States, under the U.S. Constitution. It interprets the law as we pass the laws of the land. We may not like it. Some of their decisions may prove inconvenient, and personally inconsistent with our individual opinion, but, nevertheless, under our constitutional form of government, the judicial department of our Government is represented by the Supreme Court of the United States. As a member of the California bar for over 30 years, and of the bar of the Supreme Court for many years, I wish to affirm my position again. It is, that the Supreme Court, as our highest Court, deserves the dignified expression of faith and confidence of this Congress and of every citizen of the United States. If it does not have this, the Commies and their fellow travelers will proclaim with loud glee and hilarity and their unpatriotic propaganda and their subversive activity, that our form of representative constitutional government has not worked well. We can honestly criticize a decision, but I do not conceive of it being strengthening to the endurableness of our constitutional government to condemn the Court itself. To do so, makes for weakness of our fortress against Soviet communism.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. JOHANSEN. I would like to associate myself with a view expressed relative to the U.S. Supreme Court—and as long as it remains the Supreme Court and a truly judicial body, I have the utmost respect for it—some 90 years ago by Abraham Lincoln in his first inaugural address, when he said that if the decision of the Supreme Court in a specific case must thereafter become the irrevocable law of the land, then we will have ceased to be our own rulers in this country.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CORBETT. I am not an attorney and certainly not a constitutional attorney, but I believe that those who feel this law may be unconstitutional because of the provisions which relate to the invoking of the fifth amendment are losing sight of the basic fact.

This is not a penalty provision in the true sense of the word. No one is, or will be, deprived of any of his own money. Under the terms of this bill he gets his money back, but because he has refused to testify when he has a duty to do so, by reason of his official position with the Government, the U.S. Government has a right to withhold from him any special benefits which accrue to him in this event. I submit, therefore, that what we are trying to do is to prevent an employee getting special benefits from the taxpayers when he has failed to keep his contract with the U.S. Government.

In this connection, I believe that these statements of public policy, set forth by the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, are significant:

> Adverse and hostile policies, attitudes, and other actions of certain foreign nations in the world today imperil the existence of the United States of America as a sovereign Nation. Proof exists at every hand that one of the primary objectives of the Communist enemy is the infiltration of the Government of the United States with hostile influences in order to undermine and overthrow the Government. It is beyond the bounds of right and reason that an individual, whose acts or omissions are calculated to impede the national defense, safety, and security or to give aid and comfort or secure any advantage to foreign hostile forces and influences, should derive any Federal benefit in the form of annuity or retired pay based on his service as a Government officer or employee. This committee cannot emphasize too strongly that inaction and disregard on the part of the Congress of the United States or of any other organ of the Government with respect to any such situation constitutes dereliction of duty of the most serious nature.
> It is apparent to this committee that a significant principle with respect to the nature of the benefits at issue has not been given the proper weight in the consideration of existing law. This principle is to the effect that an individual who assumes public office or employment accepts all of the obligations (explicit and implicit) of such office or employment as well as the emoluments thereof. When an individual enters the service of the United States, he imposes upon himself an extraordinary—even a unique—commitment of complete and unswerving loyalty to government and to country. This obligation of loyalty is preemptive of any and all rights and benefits accruing from public office or employment. Fulfillment of such obligation of loyalty at all times is an absolute condition precedent to the granting, vesting, and receipt of any right, benefit, or remedy arising out of the office or employment in the past, present, or future.
> Breach of this obligation or high trust by an individual guilty of an act or omission which impairs the national security abrogates from the beginning any obligation of the United States to pay benefits based on the service of such individual. All claims for such benefits must stand or fall along with those of the individual whose conduct is at issue. In the case of such breach of trust, it is entirely fitting and proper to deny such benefits and at the same time make appropriate return of contributions made by the individual concerned. These benefits are, in part, in the nature of gratuities because of Government contributions toward such benefits. In effect, the payment of any such benefits to any such individual would be shocking to the public conscience and morals and repugnant to the high principles on which our Government is founded. This was made abundantly evident, during the consideration of the bill that became Public Law 769, 83d Congress.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. FULTON. That brings up a remarkable question. Does Alger Hiss have a right to get his money back, with interest, from the Government, and has he asked for it?

Mr. CORBETT. The answer is that he has not received his money and he has not asked for it, but he is entitled to it.

Mr. FULTON. And is he entitled to interest on his money?

Mr. CORBETT. Certainly, as provided by the Retirement Act.

Mr. FULTON. Why did not the Solicitor General of the United States in the Steinberg case develop this on all aspects of the constitutional question? Why did he not appeal from the Court of Claims decision to the U.S. Supreme Court to clarify this question before recommending this legislation? Why did he not do it? Will somebody answer me on that?

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. CORBETT. The answer is that everybody agreed that there should be a change in the law to clarify and strengthen it and that further appeal would be undesirable, particularly since he was going to recommend this particular change in the law.

Mr. FULTON. I believe it was an error on the part of the Solicitor General not to have settled this question in advance before recommending legislation. This question of constitutionality should be settled; and all the gentleman from Maryland, the gentleman from California, and I are doing is simply trying to check out on all phases of this matter of constitutionality. Under the rules of the Supreme Court if a matter is unconstitutional in one phase the entire act falls. If they hold it is unconstitutional to put a penalty on a person for exercising his rights under a section of the Constitution of the United States we should not try to do what amounts to just that. I for one cannot see how a constitutional exercise of the right to plead the fifth amendment which the Supreme Court says is not even an inference of guilt gives Congress the right to assess a penalty against anyone exercising his constitutional rights.

Mr. CORBETT. It is not assessed on that ground, but because he has violated his obligation as an employee of the United States of America in refusing to give information which it is his duty to give because of accepting that employment.

Mr. FOLEY. In connection with the position taken by my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON] I would like to quote this language from the Supreme Court cited in the Steinberg case. The Supreme Court has held in the case of Slochower against the Board of Education:

> The privilege against self-incrimination would be reduced to a hollow mockery if its exercise could be taken as equivalent to a confession of guilt. The privilege serves to protect the innocent who otherwise might be ensnared by ambiguous circumstances.

My question, I may say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES], is this: As a member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee and one who is in favor of the adoption of H.R. 4601, it is my understanding that the purpose is to eliminate this unfair provision referring to crimes not involving national security and not involving loyalty. It is also my understanding that it is the purpose of the amendment, H.R. 4601, to eliminate that provision pertaining to the exercise of the constitutional right, in other words, exercising the guarantee provided by the fifth amendment. My opinion is based upon the fact that the original act, section 2, specifically authorized the forfeiture of benefits where the refusal to answer was on the ground of self-incrimination. H.R. 4601 eliminates that provision.

It seems to me that it was the intent of the committee when they reported out H.R. 4601 to eliminate all reference to the exercise of constitutional rights as forming the basis for the imposition of any penalty or sanction.

My question arises because of the fact that in the report of the committee on page 7 the statement is made:

> Section 2(a) of the amendment prohibits annuities or retired pay to persons refusing on ground of self-incrimination.

I concur in the opinion stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON] that the Court of Claims is correct in holding that for the exercise of a constitutional right, regardless of what that right may be, the Congress cannot impose any loss of any benefit, cannot impose any penalty or sanction. This is true not only in the case of crimes or misdemeanors, but in all other cases, and Congress cannot except from this fixed principle cases involving the serious charges of loyalty and security. Therefore I join with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the conclusion that if this bill in any respect in loyalty or security matters seeks to impose sanctions or penalties upon the exercise of the constitutional guarantee under the fifth amendment that it will be struck down by the Supreme Court as unconstitutional.

Mr. REES of Kansas. As a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Civil Service, and one of the most diligent members of that committee, I believe the gentleman supports this legislation?

Mr. FOLEY. Yes; I am in favor of the bill; but my questions are prompted by the language in the report. The purpose of the amendment, as I understand it, is to eliminate the original provision which called for the forfeiture of benefits upon the exercise of the constitutional right. I have been somewhat at a loss to understand why that has not been categorically and positively set forth in the report, to prevent any conclusion from being drawn that the purpose of the bill is not to do away with the original provisions providing for a sanction or penalty upon the invocation of the fifth amendment protection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. The bill sets out the policy as carefully and clearly as can be done.

Mr. FOLEY. That is my understanding. It is the report that has misled me.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. Briefly. I think the gentleman supports this legislation?

Mr. FULTON. I am supporting it but it brings these questions up. We do not want to have the legislation declared unconstitutional merely because of the lack of congressional intent in the language we are setting out here. I believe our purpose is to make sure that we are not going beyond constitutional limits. This brings up a precedent, and I think the veterans' organizations of the country should take cognizance of this fact.

This brings up a precedent, as I say. Every action we take here is going to be cited as a precedent later. I am a former veteran and that brings to mind this: When somebody is convicted by a court-martial and discharged from the service, he loses his rank, his pay, his retirement, and his GI education rights, whether it is on the security of the country, loyalty or on a small little thing that sometimes would not even be a misdemeanor in a State. So, we are here in the U.S. Congress in one instance depriving a serviceman and his widow dependent, also his children, of support when it involves only a misdemeanor.

I hope that the veterans' organizations will look into this because there has been a lot of injustice done to many of our veterans in this country when they have been deprived of their retirement right, their disability right, their citizenship rights, yes, and their widow's and their children's support rights, and also they have lost their GI education rights that would simply make them better U.S. citizens. How can we say we are not doing that?

I strongly favor and recommend that the Congress and the Committee on Armed Services particularly take up the situation because there has been a tremendous injustice in many cases.

Mr. CORBETT. I do want to say to both the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we appreciate the fact that their concern for the welfare of this legislation has prompted their remarks. But I do think this needs to be added: The full intent of the committee and those counseling on this bill was to bring here a measure that would provide, first, that no one who is guilty of subversion or disloyalty may secure additional gratuities or benefits from the people of the United States and, second, that employees, former employees, and their families not be deprived of their benefits because of comparatively minor offenses. That has been the intent, and I submit, as both the gentlemen pointed out, that this bill represents the best possible means to obtain these objectives. If a constitutional question exists, the ultimate decision will have to be with the courts of the United States. Further discussion on this matter here would seem to serve no purpose.

Mr. FOLEY. You have reference to a conviction for these offenses by a court of law rather than the exercise of a constitutional right, being the basis or the ground for forfeiture of the benefits, is that correct?

I repeat my question. Your views were premised on this basis, that the person involved has been convicted by a court of law of the charges against him and that the forfeiture of his benefit depends upon that act rather than upon the exercise of a constitutional right; is that correct, sir?

Mr. CORBETT. It is the failure to act on the part of the employee who is in duty bound to act in keeping with his contract made when he took office. It does not result in a penalty or punishment in the form of forfeiture of the benefit. It results in a justified refusal by the Government to give him a benefit because he has failed to act in accordance with the rules laid down which he accepted when he took office.

Mr. FOLEY. On the ground other than the protection of the fifth amendment invocation; is that correct, sir?

Mr. CORBETT. Any refusal or failure to act when it is his duty to act, whatever it might be, in violation of the contract between him and the Government of the United States seems to be due and adequate cause.

Mr. FOLEY. Which failure would include the invocation of the fifth amendment protection.

Mr. CORBETT. If the fifth amendment is being utilized as a shield for him to refuse to do his duty—and even possibly to aid and abet the weakening or destruction of the Constitution—certainly, then, the invocation of it itself is a violation of his contract of employment.

Mr. FOLEY. If it is on that basis, I disagree with you on the ground it would be unconstitutional.

Mr. FULTON. How can the invocation of a constitutional right guaranteed under the Constitution be a breach of his oath under the statutes that this Congress has passed for his protection? I do not understand that.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I gather from this discussion that we have had that no one who has spoken is opposing this legislation as it is written. We are glad to have this discussion and to have these matters pointed out. But let us remember that this matter of denial of retirement benefits deals only with the question of national security. I do not believe that the questions raised should delay approval of this legislation.

Again, it should be noted that this legislation was reported unanimously by the Post Office and Civil Service Committee and will carry out what is believed to be the recognized public policy.

In my judgment, this legislation should be passed by the House and enacted into law.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, we have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further requests for time, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act entitled "An Act to prohibit payment of annuities to officers and employees of the United States convicted of certain offenses, and for other purposes", approved September 1, 1954,

"SEC. 4. (a) In the case of—

"(1) the conviction of any person, under any article or provision of law specified or described in subsection (a) of the first section of this Act, of any offense within the purview of such subsection (a) to the extent provided in such subsection, or the commission by any person of any violation of subsection (a) or (b) of section 2 of this Act, or

"(2) the conviction of any person, under any article or provision of law specified or described in subsection (b) of the first section of this Act, of any offense within the purview of such subsection (b) to the extent provided in such subsection, or the commission by any person of any violation of subsection (c) of section 2 of this Act, any amounts (not including employment taxes) contributed by such person toward an annuity the benefits of which are denied under this Act (less any amounts previously refunded or previously paid as annuity benefits) shall be refunded, upon appropriate application therefor—

"(A) to such person,

"(B) if such person is deceased, to such other person or persons as may be designated to receive refunds by or under the law, regulation, or agreement under which the annuity (the benefits of which are denied under this Act) would have been payable, or

"(C) if there is no such designation, in the order of precedence prescribed in section 11(c) of the Civil Service Retirement Act (70 Stat. 755; 5 U.S.C. 2261(c)).

"(b) Each refund under subsection (a) of this section shall be made with interest at such rates and for such periods as may be provided under the law, regulation, or agreement under which the annuity would have been payable. Such interest shall not be computed—

"(1) if paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of this section is applicable, for any period after the date of conviction or commission of violation, as the case may be, or after September 1, 1954, whichever date is later, or

"(2) if paragraph (2) of subsection (a) of this section is applicable, for any period after the date of conviction or commission of violation, as the case may be, or after the date of enactment of this amendment, whichever date is later.

"(c) No person whose annuity is denied under this Act shall be required to repay that part of any annuity otherwise properly paid to such person which is in excess of the aggregate amount of his own contributions toward such annuity, with applicable interest.

"(d) No survivor or beneficiary of any such person shall be required to repay that part of any annuity otherwise properly paid to such person or to such survivor or beneficiary on the basis of the service of such person which is in excess of the aggregate amount of the contributions of such person toward annuity, with applicable interest.

"SEC. 5. (a) No person (including an eligible beneficiary under chapter 73 of title 10 of the United States Code or under section 5 of the Uniformed Services Contingency Option Act of 1953 (67 Stat. 504; 37 U.S.C., 1952 edition, Supp. III, sec. 374)) to whom payment of retired pay is denied under this Act shall be required to refund to the United States any retired pay otherwise properly paid to such person or beneficiary which is paid in violation of this Act.

"(b) In the case of the conviction of, or the commission of any violation by, any person to the extent provided in paragraph (1) or paragraph (2), as the case may be, of section 4(a) of this Act, any deposits made under section 1438 of chapter 73 of title 10 of the United States Code, or under section 5 of the Uniformed Services Contingency Option Act of 1953 (67 Stat. 504; 37 U.S.C., 1952 edition, Supp. III, sec. 374), to provide the eligible beneficiary with annuity for any period (less amounts previously paid as retired pay benefits) shall be refunded, upon appropriate application therefor, in accordance with such section 4(a), with interest as provided in section 4(b) of this Act.

"SEC. 6. (a) The right to receive an annuity or retired pay shall be deemed restored to any person convicted, prior to, on, or after September 1, 1954, of an offense which is within the purview of the first section of this Act or which constitutes a violation of section 2 of this Act, for which he is denied under this Act an annuity or retired pay, to whom a pardon for such offense is granted by the President of the United States, prior to, on, or after September 1, 1954, and to the survivor or beneficiary of such person. Such restoration of the right to receive an annuity or retired pay shall be effective as of the date on which such pardon is granted. Any amounts refunded to such person under section 4 or section 5(b) of this Act shall be redeposited before credit is allowed for the period or periods of service covered by the refund. No payment of annuity or retired pay shall be made, by virtue of such pardon, for any period prior to the date on which such pardon is granted.

"(b) The President is authorized to restore, effective as of such date as he may prescribe, the right to receive an annuity or retired pay to any person who is denied, prior to, on, or after September 1, 1954, an annuity or retired pay under section 2 of this Act, and to the survivor or beneficiary of such person. Any amounts refunded to such person under section 4 or section 5(b) of this Act shall be redeposited before credit is allowed for the period or periods of service covered by the refund. No payment of annuity or retired pay shall be made, by virtue of such restoration of annuity or retired pay by the President under this subsection, for any period prior to the effective date of such restoration of annuity or retired pay.

"(c) The right to receive an annuity or retired pay shall not be denied because of any conviction of an offense which is within the purview of the first section of this Act or which constitutes a violation of section 2 of this Act, in any case in which it is established by satisfactory evidence that such conviction or violation resulted from proper compliance with orders issued, in a confidential relationship, by a department, agency, establishment, or other authority of any branch of the Government of the United States or of the government of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 7. No accountable officer or employee of the Government shall be held responsible for any payment made in violation of any provision of this Act if such payment is made in due course and without fraud, collusion, or gross negligence.

"SEC. 8. (a) The President may—

"(1) drop from the rolls any member of the armed forces, and any member of the Coast and Geodetic Survey or of the Public Health Service, who is deprived of retired pay under the provisions of this Act, and

"(2) (A) restore to any person so dropped from the rolls to whom retired pay is restored by reason of any provision of or change in this Act (including the provisions of section 2 of the Act which enacts this clause), his military status, and (B) restore to him and his beneficiaries all rights and privileges of which he or they were deprived by reason of his name having been dropped from the rolls.

"(b) If the person so restored was a commissioned officer he may be reappointed by the President alone to the grade and position on the retired list which he held at the time his name was dropped from the rolls.

"SEC. 9. This Act shall not be construed to restrict any authority under any other provision of law to deny or withhold benefits authorized by law.

"SEC. 10. As used in this Act—

"(1) the term 'officer or employee of the Government' includes—

"(A) an officer or employee in or under the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of the Government of the United States;

"(B) a Member of, Delegate to, or Resident Commissioner in, the Congress of the United States;

"(C) an officer or employee of the government of the District of Columbia; and

"(D) a member or former member of the armed forces, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, or the Public Health Service.

(a) Subject to subsection (b) of this section, any person, including his survivor or beneficiary, to whom annuity or retired pay is not payable under the Act of September 1, 1954, as in effect at any time prior to the date of enactment of this Act, by reason of any conviction of an offense, any commission of a violation, any refusal to answer, or any absence under indictment, or under charges, for any offense, shall be restored the right to receive such annuity or retired pay, for any and all periods for which he would have had the right to receive such annuity or retired pay if the Act of September 1, 1954, had not been enacted, unless, under the amendment made by the first section of this Act, such annuity or retired pay remains nonpayable to such person, including his survivor or beneficiary.

(b) No annuity accrued or accruing, prior to, on, or after the date of enactment of this Act, on account of the restoration, by reason of the amendment made by the first section of this Act and by reason of subsection (a) of this section, of the right to receive such annuity, shall be paid until any sum refunded under section 3 of the Act of September 1, 1954, as in effect prior to the date of enactment of such amendment, is deposited or is collected by offset against the annuity.

Mr. MURRAY (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, strike out "740b-740l" and insert in lieu thereof "2281–2288".

Page 24, line 24, strike out the word "thereby" and the period and the quotation marks immediately following such word and insert in lieu thereof "thereby.".

Page 24, immediately following line 24, insert the following:

"SEC. 12. (a) Section 3282 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by striking out 'three' and inserting in lieu thereof 'five'.

"(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall be effective with respect to offenses (1) committed on or after September 1, 1954, or (2) committed prior to such date, if on such date prosecution therefor is not barred by provisions of law in effect prior to such date."

Page 26, strike out line 23 and all that follows down through the period in line 6 on page 26.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, may I ask the chairman and the ranking member of the Committee on the Post Office and Civil Service, whether this legislation is based in any respect on the legal premise that there are different ways of exercising rights under the fifth amendment of the Constitution? For example, are there any different ways of exercising the right of a citizen to plead the fifth amendment in a criminal proceeding?

Mr. REES of Kansas. The answer is "No."

Mr. FULTON. What does the chairman of the committee say about that?

Mr. MURRAY. The answer is "No."

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, then I believe that if the law is applied equally in the matter of exercise or invocation of the fifth amendment, if this act were unconstitutional in one situation of such invocation or plea, it would have to be of necessity unconstitutional as to this particular provision in the next instance when the fifth amendment is pleaded, regardless of what the reason is, or the degree of the offense whether security or loyalty charge, felony or misdemeanor. I believe that that particular section of the legislation will be unconstitutional and therefore we should give it further study by the proper committee on the conference. We in Congress have the obligation of making the intent of the Congress clear, and must neither transgress constitutional limitations nor make laws that require different exercise of the same rights under any section or amendment of the U.S. Constitution.

Mr. CURTIS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I strongly favor this bill and hope that it will receive broad support.

This bill corrects an unfair situation which first came to my attention as the result of the hardship caused to a constituent who appealed to me.

Her difficulty resulted from the forfeiture of annuities required under the act of September 1, 1954, Public Law 769, 83d Congress, which the bill now before us amends.

My constituent was the widow of a civil-service employee. As a result of over 30 years of Government work, and payments into the retirement fund, he built up rights which would have entitled his widow to substantial retirement benefits. These, however, were denied to her because her husband had, in 1940, prior to the passage of the above 1954 law, been guilty of a minor mail theft, for which he had been duly punished.

He was for a time separated from the service, but was later reinstated and continued in good faith making payments into the retirement fund.

I felt that this forfeiture of benefits, the burden of which fell on the innocent widow, was unnecessarily harsh and went beyond what was properly needed for the protection of the public. It appeared to me that if the forfeiture provisions were confined to offenses against the national security, that would both bring about a fairer result and would bring the act of September 1, 1954, in line with the main purposes of that act.

I therefore filed a bill to limit in this manner the act of September 1, 1954. This was H.R. 9164 in the 85th Congress, 1st session. The Civil Service Commission reported favorably on this bill. It concurred in its objective and proposed substitute language which, in fact, formed the basis of the bill now before the House. The Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, in its report on the bill now before us, gave its firm support to the above objective where it said on page 3:

> The primary purpose of the act of September 1, 1954, as originally enacted, was to prohibit the payment of any Federal annuity or retired pay to any individual because of the commission by such individual of an offense involving the national security of the United States. However, such act, in its entirety and as now in effect, contains provisions which exceed this purpose and have resulted in the denial of Federal retirement benefits to certain individuals and their survivors for reasons which are not related to the primary purpose of such act.

This is a just bill which preserves and strengthens the main purpose of existing law and at the same time tempers justice with mercy. It should receive the support of this House.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am gravely concerned that the legislative history of this bill, H.R. 4601, will not clearly reflect the intent of the Members of the House of Representatives in passing it today. In voting for H.R. 4601, I wish to make clear that my vote is based upon the fact that section 2 of the bill deletes from original title 5, United States Code, section 2283, the words, "upon the ground of self-incrimination." By this deletion, it is my understanding that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, of which I am a member, intended to remove any and all bases for holding the act unconstitutional insofar as the exercise of the constitutional guarantee against self-incrimination is involved.

By way of recapitulation, I wish to point out that the present act reads as follows:

> Title 5, United States Code, section 2283: "There would not be paid to any person who has failed or refused, or fails or refuses, prior to, on, or after September 1, 1954, upon the ground of self-incrimination, to appear, to testify, or produce, any book, papers, record, or other document, with respect to his service as an officer or employee of the Government or with respect to any relationship which he has had or has with a foreign government, in any proceeding before a Federal grand jury, court of the United States, or congressional committee."

The pertinent provision of H.R. 4601 is as follows:

> SEC. 2(a). There shall not be paid to any person who, prior to, on, or after September 1, 1954, has refused or refuses, or knowingly or willfully has failed or fails, to appear, testify, or produce any books, paper, record, or other document, relating to his service as an officer or employee of the Government, before a Federal grand jury, court of the United States, court-martial, or congressional committee, in any proceeding with respect to—.

Special attention is called to the fact that H.R. 4601 deletes the language "upon the ground of self-incrimination." The overall change brought about by H.R. 4601 is to limit section 2's application to matters involving the national security or defense of the United States. Title 5, section 2283 now applies to all aspects of a Federal officer or employee's service whether or not national security or the defense of the United States is involved. Limiting section 2 to loyalty and security matters, in my judgment, is an important improvement over the present law. Likewise eliminating references to the fifth amendment, in my judgment, now makes certain the provision is constitutional. This conclusion is based upon the decision of the U.S. Court of Claims in Steinberg against the United States rendered in July of 1958. With this understanding, I have voted for H.R. 4601.

I wish to direct attention, however, to what appears to me to be a mistaken and unfortunate statement in the committee report to accompany H.R. 4601. On page 7 appears the following language:

> Section 2 of the amendment is in two parts, as in the case of the first section, because of the necessity to include in this legislation certain security and loyalty offenses not covered by existing law.
> Section 2(a) of the amendment prohibits annuities or retired pay to persons refusing, on grounds of self-incrimination, to testify or produce documents, in proceedings relating to loyalty, or with respect to their relations with foreign governments. This continues present law, except as to offenses not involving loyalty.

The implication from this language is that invocation of the protection of the fifth amendment still may be the basis for the forfeiture of annuity benefits in cases involving Federal loyalty and security issues. I strongly condemn every person found guilty of disloyalty to the United States and equally condemn one who jeopardizes the security of the United States. Treason is a heinous crime. However, the Federal Constitution insures an accused person of a fair trial and one of the aspects of a fair trial is the guarantee against self-incrimination. Therefore, in my judgment, it is not the intent of the House of Representatives in passing H.R. 4601 to provide that the invocation of the protection against self-incrimination will provide the occasion for the forfeiture of annuities or retired pay benefits. With this understanding, I have voted for H.R. 4601.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further amendments?

If not, under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. EVINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 4601) to amend the act of September 1, 1954, in order to limit to cases involving the national security the prohibition on payment of annuities and retired pay to officers and employees of the United States, to clarify the application and operation of such act, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 238, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may insert their remarks in the RECORD prior to the vote on the bill H.R. 4601.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING APPROPRIATIONS TO THE NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 240 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 1096) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for salaries and expenses, research and development, construction and equipment, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Science and Astronautics, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 240 makes in order the consideration of S. 1096, which provides for the authorization of supplemental appropriations for fiscal 1959 to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. The appropriation would cover salaries and expenses, research and development, construction and equipment, and for other purposes. This resolution provides for an open rule and 1 hour of debate.

The total sum to be authorized is $48,354,000 for the following purposes:

First, salaries, $3,354,000.

Second, research and development, $20,750,000.

Third, jet propulsion laboratory, Pasadena, Calif., $9 million.

Fourth, global range tracking and communication facilities, $15,250,000.

The major items to be procured under research and development are the satellite capsules, 12 to be delivered during fiscal 1960. Booster systems, including solid-rocket clusters and liquid systems, are likewise being procured to provide for a progressive series of unmanned flights at increasing velocities up to orbital speeds to refine both vehicular systems and operational techniques to insure the safety of later manned operations.

The jet propulsion laboratory item of $9 million provides for expansion and modernization of the facilities at Pasadena, Calif.

The item of $12 million plus for tracking facilities is needed to improve present sites and build new ones as this phase of the satellite program is ever changing due to increases in the speeds of the satellites.

This is a Department bill approved by the Bureau of the Budget.

I urge the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, there is 1 hour of debate on this legislation. I know of no opposition to the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 1096) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for salaries and expenses, research and development, construction and equipment, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1096, with Mr. COFFIN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of S. 1096 is to authorize supplemental appropriations for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for the fiscal year 1959.

This authorization bill is divided into three parts:

First. Salaries and expenses, $3,354,000.

Second. Research and development, $20,750,000.

Third. Construction and equipment, $24,250,000.

I would like to briefly explain these portions of the bill. First, the $3,354,000 supplemental estimate for salaries and expenses is to cover the cost of salary increases provided for by the Federal Employees' Salary Increase Act of 1958. Funds for these salary increases were not provided to NASA last year. I want to emphasize that these funds do not provide for any additional positions. We may have to come before Congress and ask for some additional positions in the 1960 authorization bill, but, insofar as this fiscal year 1959 supplement is concerned, NASA is only asking for funds to pay for the salary increases voted by the Congress last year.

Next, let me turn to the $20,750,000 request for research and development. These funds are earmarked entirely for the manned space flight program—Project Mercury. I believe all the Members of the House recognize that it is becoming increasingly evident that full exploitation of the potentialities of space flight for benefiting mankind will be dependent on the development of practical capabilities for operating manned space vehicles. Now, in order to provide this capability, a progressive program of research and development has been undertaken. I believe all of you recognize that the American people would not look with favor on any program to put a man in space unless we were sure we could bring him back safely. In order to obtain this assurance, it will be necessary to make exhaustive tests and trials. This will be done by launching satellites and later we will put primates into space in order to test their reactions. If everything goes as we have planned, we can look forward to putting a man into space at a later date. Just how soon this will be is dependent on the tests, but I am most hopeful that it can be done in less than 2 years.

The major items to be procured for this project are the satellite capsules. Twelve capsules will be delivered during fiscal year 1960. In this bill NASA is requesting a total of $4 million for the designing, engineering, and early construction phases of these satellites. Sixteen million dollars is being requested for eight boosters—four Redstone and four Atlas. These will be used for short-range tests and qualification flights. Another item of $200,000 is for data acquisition and handling equipment; $500,000 for simulators and personnel equipment for human factor research and personnel training; and $50,000 for other research and development costs. As I mentioned previously, this brings the total in the bill to $20,750,000.

I would next like to turn to the provision in the bill for construction and equipment. The amount of this authorization is $24,250,000.

This authorization is needed to provide new facilities, improvements to existing facilities and the acquisition of approximately 70 acres of land for the jet propulsion laboratory at Pasadena, Calif. The authorization for this facility would be $9 million. The jet propulsion laboratory was under Army control, but was transferred to NASA in December of 1958. This laboratory has done outstanding research and development work in missile, satellite, and space probe fields, and NASA expects to rely highly on the laboratory in the future for advanced research and development in support of the national space program. However, the laboratory needs extensive modernization and expansion. It is necessary to acquire 67.56 acres of land, construct roads and utilities, relocate test facilities, modernize existing support facilities, and construct a few new support facilities. The estimated completion time for the facility is 14 months.

The next item in the bill is for global-range tracking and communication facilities and equipment. It is necessary to provide basic tracking, data acquisition, and communications capability that is essential for instrumentation coverage of satellites and space vehicles to be flown during the next 12 to 18 months. It is necessary that we extend and improve the earth satellite electronic tracking network. I believe you will all agree that it does little good to put satellites into orbit if we cannot track the satellites and have sufficient communication equipment to receive the information which the satellite can give out. For instance, to receive the tracking and reception of telemetry data from space probes will require the provision of special high-gain, low-noise receiving systems at several points on the earth's surface. One of these stations has already been built at Goldstone, Calif., and it is necessary to provide funds for the establishment of two additional stations, one in Australia and the other in South Africa. It is also necessary to provide for a tracking station at a location in southern Texas. This station will be used for the Project Mercury program and will provide the critical tracking capability during the final stages of reentry. The tracking facilities authorization is for $12,050,000.

Added to this sum for tracking facilities is $3,200,000 for propulsion development facilities. Very briefly, I can say that these funds are to be used to further develop the single-chamber rocket engine, having a nominal thrust of 1 million pounds. I do not believe that I have to elaborate on the need for a big rocket engine. If there is any one place in our research and development where America is behind Russia, it is in the development of large thrust engines. It is obvious that Russia leads America in this respect. This is why the Soviets have been able to put into orbit larger payloads than we have been able to launch. In this respect, we are working on two programs. One is to cluster existing engines of approximately 250,000 pounds of thrust capability each, and the other, development for which supplemental funds are requested in this bill, is to develop the single-chambered engine with 1 million pounds of thrust.

Now, that concludes my explanation of the total amount requested in the bill.

I might also add that a provision of the bill permits a variation of 5 percent in the construction and equipment items, but the total authorization cannot be exceeded. This has become more or less standard procedure in this type of legislation. The departments make the best estimates they can when coming before Congress to ask for these funds, but when bids are received they may be lower, and more often higher, than anticipated. Consequently, the Congress has permitted the departments of Government to vary upward a reasonable percent in order to meet usual cost variations, but I remind you, again, that this does not permit NASA to exceed the total authorization.

Section 2 of the bill authorizes an emergency authorization of $500,000 which, with the approval of the Bureau of the Budget, may be used for the construction of new research facilities or for the modification of existing research facilities, providing the new construction or modification has not been previously denied by Congress. This authority is necessary to meet emergencies which may arise or to take care of breakthroughs which may occur when the Congress is not in session. If this authority is not provided, NASA may not be able to meet the emergency or exploit the breakthrough until Congress has reconvened and a new request for funds could be approved. Again, I point out that there is ample precedence for this type of provision. For example, the military construction bill carries such an authorization. It should also be noted that this emergency fund of $500,000 cannot exceed the total authorization by the bill for the construction facilities.

The committee amended the bill by requiring NASA to notify the House Committee on Science and Astronautics and the Senate Committee on Aeronautical and Space Science if a decision is made to use the authority in section 2. The committee feels that the Congress would be better satisfied if the committees of Congress monitored the use of the authority in section 2.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that the Committee on Science and Astronautics voted this bill out unanimously and it passed the Senate without a dissenting vote.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Am I correct that none of the money is to be used for the rental of space in various buildings for the Science and Space Administration?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. There is not a cent in this bill for rental payments. These three items that I have already mentioned cover the contents of the bill.

I might say that the total amount authorized in the bill is $40,354,000. I think I have covered all the features of the bill unless it be one item which is a breakdown of one of the features of the bill.

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. ANFUSO. I want to congratulate the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Science and Astronautics for his very clear explanation of this bill and for his leadership in the House in getting this space program well under way. I know that his committee has met almost every day and accomplished in 3 months what ordinarily would take years to accomplish. I congratulate the House in having such a leader of the Committee on Science and Astronautics.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. The gentleman is kind. His compliments are not entirely deserved. The committee itself has worked in unison. We have had no trouble in the committee, but it is difficult to start from scratch with a new committee covering problems such as those which the committee has had before it. We have worked as a team, without any friction and without any trouble. I want to express my appreciation to all members of the committee, on both sides of the aisle, who have worked so hard.

Mr. KING of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. KING of Utah. As one of the junior members of the new Committee on Science and Astronautics, I should like to offer my congratulations for the work done by the committee under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana. Most Americans realize that the space program is important in connection with our defense effort, but beyond that many of them feel that our space effort is only an expensive toy. I should like to leave the thought that this program is not an expensive toy; that we are standing on the threshold of a new industry that the wildest imagination cannot fully encompass. I am told by scientists that in the field of meteorology alone, weather forecasting, the entire cost of the space program will be paid back in dollars and cents. When we move into the field of radio and television broadcasting and in the field of astronomic observation and in the field of reconnaissance and many, many other fields that have nonmilitary application, we realize that we are indeed standing on the threshold of great and wonderful events that have nothing to do with our military forces.

I hope that the Members of this distinguished body and all citizens of our country can grasp the vision of this tremendous program that lies ahead of us.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I think the observations of the gentleman are well taken. When we see businessmen making up the fiber of American industrial life come before us and tell us about the need for this program and the fact that they are spending millions of dollars themselves in the development of the program we all know it is a realistic one which we must face and have to develop.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 8 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, I believe the Congress should know that the field of space and science is one place where partisanship so far has not had a very great effect. As a member of the previous House Select Committee on Space and Astronautics that worked last year—I see some of the members of that committee sitting here today—it was a pleasure to work under the leadership of my good friend the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. JOHN MCCORMACK, majority leader, and likewise under the leadership of my good friend the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. JOSEPH MARTIN, who at that time was minority leader.

We at all times had unanimous decisions and unanimous committee reports. We at all times, every Member of us, put the country and the interests of science and progress above everything else, and put partisan pride so far down the line that it played no part in our decisions. As a matter of fact, when the bills on space have passed this House, they have passed unanimously. The same has happened in the other body. Then when points of disagreement had been ironed out in the conference committee the reports again were unanimous, and the acceptance of those conference reports by both the House and the Senate was unanimous.

We on the new Science and Astronautics Committee of the House are coming to you today to ask for a further authorization of appropriations in the amount of $48,354,000. If you will look at it closely you will find that it is not new money we are asking, because it was all asked for last year. Last year it was felt that the agency personnel were not quite ready with the program and at that time could not use it efficiently. The only amount of really new money is that caused by the Federal Salary Increase Act of 1958. To meet the requirements of that act this National Astronautics and Space Agency requires $3,354,000 of this total sum requested.

As has been pointed out to you in the excellent statement of the chairman, Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana, in addition, for research and development, we are asking $20,750,000; for construction and equipment, $24,250,000, a total of $48,354,000.

This legislation was reported out of our committee unanimously; that is, both sides of the committee, consisting of 25 members—15 Democrats and 10 Republicans—have agreed that this is in the interest of the United States and is necessary for efficient and economical administration and progress. This particular amount has been included in the President's budget and has also been approved by the Director of the Budget, so that it has been carefully screened on the budgetary level as well.

I would like to speak about the gains there are to be from this space program. Those gains are not all theoretical ones; they are gains that are practical and within our own view at this time. For example, Dr. Reichelderfer, Director of the U.S. Weather Bureau, has stated that with an adequate system of weather prediction we would be able to predict far in advance storms, hurricanes, tornadoes, rainfall, floods, droughts, and so forth. This would be good for our cities, agriculture, and good at sea as well, also good for our communications that are now interfered with because of magnetic storms. Dr. Reichelderfer estimates the total savings there could be under such an adequate program of weather forecasting for the United States yearly in the sum of $4 billion. I emphasize that he estimates there would be that amount of savings to the United States alone. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs it would likewise help us in our foreign aid programs because we would not always be having these disasters coming up abroad with emergency needs.

It has been pointed out, and I would like to emphasize, that we in America are ahead with our ICBM program. This is my considered judgment as a serious hardworking student of this subject, and is no casual opinion. We in the United States are going ahead on a broad basis, not only in the size of the vehicle but in the size of the engine, also in the guidance and control developments. Our programs in these fields are much more intricate and developed than the Russians, or any of our U.S. allies. Of course, the Russians had big artillery, they have always had mass forces. So it was very logical for them to end up with a tremendous kind of an instrument or space vehicles that would go off with a tremendous bang and a lot of push but not be very well controlled. That is just about what has happened.

The United States has developed a more sophisticated control. We are trying to get the right combination of weight, size, acceleration, and velocity, and combine them with good control. Our overall programs that have been worked out by the Department of Defense, under the supervision and direction of our competent Secretary of Defense, Neil McElroy, and particularly with the help of Roy Johnson of the Advanced Research Projects Agency, Dr. York and Admiral Hayward, have been well done. We people of the country should not throw up our hands when we find the Russians with bigger vehicles and a bigger bang than we have at this time. The question is, Do they have control? The answer is, they cannot control them as well as we in the United States do. As a matter of fact, on the Atlantic missile range between Canaveral and Ascension Island, we have been able to have shots that have a target capability circle of probable error that is surprisingly efficient. This means in a circle laid out of 2, 5, or 6 miles in diameter, 50 percent of the shots will land as a probability within that target area. Russia to this date on her long-range ICBM land missile range has had no such shot of the length and CEP, we in the United States have had from Cape Canaveral to Ascension Island. I say that without fear of contradiction.

Also, their missile range is not long enough to give them a landfall at the ranges we now have and are operating on efficiently between Cape Canaveral and Ascension Island. At that equivalent range they would have missile reentry off the Kamchatka Peninsula in the Pacific Ocean. We should not be too disturbed about what Russia currently is doing on her ICBM range, because we are quickly in the United States making our present generation of big vehicles obsolete. They are fast becoming as obsolete as our early airplanes. Our U.S. advances are developing at such a tremendous rate in many fields. We should, therefore, not project the current rate of production of the present generation of U.S. missiles, ICBM or IRBM, into the future of 1962, but we should emphasize research and development and construction of facilities for this research and development, which this bill now does.

So I urge every Member in the House to vote not only for the space program generally, on scientific research but, second, for our security, and third for weather benefits and the gain of $4 billion that might be possible through advanced weather predictions, and last, for this reason, that we in the United States are advancing tremendously on communications satellites. We already have been the only country in the world that has had a communications satellite where we have received voice from a satellite operation. It is a tremendous breakthrough to have done that. We can look ahead and see where they have already recommended that we go into a program of two space satellites that will carry further all the telegraph communications for our Western Hemisphere. The cost of these satellites will be from $100 million to $200 million, and they could be built within 18 months to 2 years. They would have 4 channels of radio and each one of those channels could send 500 digits or items a second. On these communication satellites it would mean the reception or sending of 2,000 digits, words, or signals per second from each of these two satellites. Now the remarkable thing about it is that those satellites would have the power to jam all sorts of radio and radiotelephone or TV communications and possibly radar communications in the area where they are operating. I would not be able to give you the specific area they would cover at the time, but with this jamming capacity, it really puts into further 1,000 percent operation our strategic air force that might be stopped by an enemy radar system. We would have the power to jam opposing radar, television, radio, not only on land where they might be operating tanks or communications, but in the upper atmosphere. In addition the United States would have the power by narrow bands or channeling communications, which would be by line of sight, to give its own message from the satellites wherever we want around the world, and that could not be jammed except within the little circumference or line of sight on the narrow band that was sending it out. You can see what a tremendous possibility that is for the defense of this country.

The General Electric Co., of Philadelphia, has already made a recommendation that we proceed immediately with the development of these two space satellites, and I recommend we should, too.

In conclusion, might I encourage the American people about space. Space is a new place, but it is not a strange place. The scientists and the astronomers have been working on space for generations. The field of space is the one place in the world where all the nations have been cooperating. Russia, the countries behind the Iron Curtain, except Communist China, all the free world countries, practically unanimously, have been working on the International Geophysical Year that ended on December 31, 1958. Likewise, on the scientific level, there is still cooperation, and many of our current U.S. programs in some respects are part of the International Geophysical Year.

Many of the scientists before our committee have stated that they could not say that Russia and her satellites had not cooperated with the United States and the free world scientists on exchanging information during the International Geophysical Year, and they could not say that there was complaint about Russian cooperation on the work that we had done together. Now, that could be a new light in the world, a new era, if such cooperation could be expanded and continued. It may be that the solvent of science and education will help settle many of the ideological differences that we have in the world today.

If we can find areas such as science and space where we can work together I believe there is hope for the future of the world and possibly the freedom we all hope for and progress will come not too long after.

I recommend the passage of the legislation.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Georgia [Mrs. BLITCH].

Mrs. BLITCH. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Vance Trimble and the Scripps-Howard papers for which he writes, have inflicted an insult upon the intelligence and the integrity of the Honorable Wellie K. Peagler, the mayor of my hometown, and that of all my friends and neighbors, the genteel people who make up its population. By so doing he has personally insulted me. For the purpose of making a cheap headline this fraudulent exponent of the fine institution of journalism and this tear sheet whose publishers suck the blood of the unsuspecting public to make its tainted dollars, printed a slanted story that was deviously arrived at by artful misrepresentation.

Had this been done to people of less refined instincts than those I am proud to have lived among in daily association for the better part of my life, irreparable damage might have been done to friendships of lifelong standing. The people I know and love, who have done everything on earth they could to help me be of some value to my fellow man through service in State and National Government, recognized the shallow story for exactly what it was—an exercise in yellow journalism.

Mr. Chairman, because of my deep respect for the dignity of Congress, the press, and the American public, I would have preferred to let the distasteful exhibitionism of Mr. Trimble die a natural death as it deserves to do. Unfortunately, his appetite for vulgar sensationalism has not yet abated and for that reason I am compelled to make this statement.

I was at home in Georgia when he wrote the story. Since then, Mr. Trimble has had the unmitigated gall to attempt to interview me again. I refuse outright to speak with this so-called member of the press until he has publicly apologized in print to my hometown and to me. Since I doubt seriously that he has the manhood to make such an apology I do not expect to see him again. He is not welcome in my office and should he insist upon coming there, I shall not hesitate to take proper action to have him removed.

Mr. Chairman, I have no quarrel with the publication of the fact that I rent office space to the Government of the United States for $100 per month, although I pity the poverty of ideas of the writer who originally wrote the story which was carried on page 1 of the Washington Post. However, the American people should take note of the fact that they are indebted to the House of Representatives, itself, for the information. Years ago this body made it possible not only for the members of the press, but for any citizen of the United States, to inspect the records of expenditures of each individual Member.

As a Member of the Congress, I am far more careful with the expenditure of public funds than I am with my own. When I arrived in Congress in January 1955, the Members were allowed only one official office in their districts. They were entitled to $900 per year for office rent or space in a Federal building if such was available.

My congressional district in Georgia is composed of 20 counties and is the largest in geographical area in the State. Waycross, Ga., is the most centrally located town in my district and is 27 miles from my hometown of Homerville. To give the approximately 300,000 people I represent the service they are entitled to, I decided to establish an office there. There was no available space in the Post Office Building in Waycross. I tried for several months to find suitable office space for $75 per month—the sum I was allowed. I could not find it. One small room I might have had, but no more.

My constituents rarely call one at a time. Often several delegations visit me at the same time. Each person considers his or her business private, and I respect that privacy. For that reason alone, a Member of Congress should always have at least two rooms for a business office.

In desperation I asked the judge of the Federal district court if I might have the use of his chambers in the Post Office Building. He graciously granted my request and so this space became my principal district office. The judge's chambers are lovely and the Government was saved $900 per year. However, when a session of court is held, my files are moved into other quarters temporarily and my staff and I are in the halls or other places in the building. None of us has ever particularly minded this for any reason other than the inconvenience it causes my constituents, and court sessions seldom last more than a week at the time.

For many years before coming to Congress, I was a member of the State legislature and Democratic National Committeewoman. For this reason it became imperative that I have office space at home. At considerable expense, my husband and I remodeled our house to provide for this.

One office was never enough for my district, and I continued to maintain this second office after I was elected to Congress. During the 7 months that Congress is in session activity is light in both district offices. It is necessarily concentrated in the Washington office. But, when we adjourn, and I go home, most of my staff go with me. There are one, two, or three people in each district office at all times, and the Washington office is also left open. I spend my time in all three of them during these months and in traveling back and forth over the district making speeches and learning as much as possible the continuing needs of the people.

On August 1, 1957, the Congress took official recognition of the need of two congressional district offices and made $100 per month available for this purpose. Whether or not this action had been taken I would have continued to use the facilities of my home for the benefit of the grand people I represent. Nevertheless, I do not hesitate to express my gratitude for the compensation. When I came to Congress I had a few thousand dollars of my own and I owed not a cent in the world. Now I am in debt by several thousands of dollars. Fortunately, my husband and I own some property and my creditors are safe, although I have spent many sleepless nights worrying about the accumulation of debts, and I would state this unequivocally. Regardless of the expense and many other personal sacrifices, I am proud and grateful of the opportunity of representing the people of the Eighth Congressional District of Georgia in the Congress of the United States, and I shall continue to represent them here so long as they and the gentle hand of providence provide the opportunity.

Mr. Chairman, the discreditable story of Mr. Trimble did me no harm among the people of the Eighth Congressional District of Georgia. I received only one letter from one constituent, and that letter was to praise me for saving the Government $900 a year. Although the national press and television carried the story, not a single daily or weekly paper published in Georgia's Eighth District carried his version of the story. Only one paper carried the straight story of the rental.

The type story Mr. Trimble wrote inspires the pathologically sick to take their pens or pencils in hand. I received approximately 40 letters and postcards from the Northeastern States lambasting me in various types of language, but most of these lacked the courage to sign their names. There were a few who, of course, were honestly indignant. Since they do not know me personally, I can understand.

These letters are living proof of the disservice Mr. Trimble has performed for his profession and for the American people.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would say, "Long live the freedom of the American press." And I want to assure the Members of this body that my strong belief in this freedom is not one whit deterred by the disgrace that one member of the fourth estate has brought upon that basic institution of our American way of life.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for the fiscal year 1959 the sum of $48,354,000 as follows:

(1) For an additional amount for "Salaries and expenses", $3,354,000.

(2) For an additional amount for "Research and development", $20,750,000.

(3) For an additional amount for "Construction and equipment", $24,250,000 as follows:

(A) Jet Propulsion Laboratory, Pasadena, California: New facilities, improvements to existing facilities, and approximately seventy acres of land, $9,000,000; and

(B) Various locations: Global range tracking and communication facilities and equipment, and propulsion development facilities, $15,250,000.

(b) Authorization is hereby granted whereby either the amount prescribed in subparagraph (A) or the amount prescribed in subparagraph (B) of subsection (a) (3) may, in the discretion of the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administrator, be varied upward 5 per centum to meet unusual cost variations, but the total cost of all work authorized under such subparagraphs shall not exceed a total of $24,250,000.

SEC. 2. Any amount, not to exceed $500,000, of the funds appropriated pursuant to authorization of subsection (a) (3) of the first section for the construction of facilities described under such subsection may, with the approval of the Bureau of the Budget, be used for the construction of new research facilities or for the modification of existing research facilities not specifically authorized in this Act, if such construction or modification is deemed by the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to be of greater urgency than the construction of any facility authorized by this Act; but no such funds shall be used for the construction or modification of any facility if funds for such construction or modification have been previously denied by the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 2, following the word "act" change the semicolon to a colon, strike the balance of line 2 and all of lines 3, 4, and 5 and add the following: "Provided, That upon reaching a final decision to implement, the Administrator or his designee shall notify the Committee on Science and Astronautics of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences of the Senate, of the cost of such construction of new research facilities or the modification of existing research facilities: Provided further, That no such funds shall be used for the construction or modification of any facility if funds for such construction or modification have been previously denied by the Congress."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly, the Committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COFFIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 1096) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for salaries and expenses, research and development, construction and equipment, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 240, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MODIFYING REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 of 1939 AND REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1953

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 236 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1321) to amend Reorganization Plan Numbered 2 of 1953. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Government Operations, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], and pending that I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 236 makes in order the consideration of H.R. 1321, to amend the Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953. This resolution provides for an open rule and 2 hours of debate.

The purposes of H.R. 1321 are, first, to restore to the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration the authority to approve or disapprove loans, without the supervision or direction of, or any other control by, the Secretary of Agriculture, under the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, as amended; and second, to reestablish in the Rural Electrification Administration, as a matter of law, the functions vested in that agency by the 1936 act. Except for the approval or disapproval of loans, the Rural Electrification Administration will remain under the general supervision and direction of the Secretary of Agriculture. His power to redistribute its functions among other agencies of the Department will, however, be eliminated.

The Rural Electrification Administration was created by Executive Order 7037 of May 11, 1935. Statutory provision for the agency was made in the Rural Electrification Act of May 20, 1936, which authorized loans for facilities to bring central station electric service to rural people who did not have it.

REA became a part of the Department of Agriculture under Reorganization Plan No. 2, effective July 1, 1939. Under Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 there were transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture the functions of the Administrator of REA and the power was given the Secretary to delegate these functions as he deemed appropriate. The 1939 plan transferred the REA along with its functions to the Department of Agriculture but provided it should retain its identity as a separate unit within the Department under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary. The plan of 1953, on the other hand, clearly transferred the functions of the REA to the Secretary and gave him the power to exercise these functions, himself, or to delegate them to any officer in the Department.

In 1954 the Secretary did, in fact, assign these functions to the Administrator of Rural Electrification Administration but with the reservation that such delegation of authority is subject to withdrawal or amendment at any time.

Subsequently, the Secretary issued an unwritten order to the Administrator of the REA to submit for review by the Director of Agricultural Credit Services all loans over $500,000 prior to their approval by the Administrator. Later this figure was changed to $1 million.

Under H.R. 1321, any functions transferred to the Department or the Secretary by the 1939 or 1953 plan will be put back in the Administrator of REA, and the Administrator shall carry out these functions within the Department of Agriculture under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary. Thus the REA will remain intact within the Department and its functions may not be distributed to other officers or units elsewhere in the Department. The functions relating to the approval or disapproval of loans, however, will not be subject to the supervision or direction or to any other control by the Secretary of Agriculture.

I urge the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLLING. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Did I understand the gentleman to make some reference to the effect of the Reorganization Order of 1939 insofar as the power of the Secretary was concerned over the making of loans?

Mr. BOLLING. My understanding is that in the 1939 reorganization, there was a covering-in of the agency; but that it was the 1953 reorganization that gave the Secretary of Agriculture the power of supervision and in fact final decision over the loans.

Mr. HALLECK. I am afraid the gentleman is in error if the report is correct because on page 2 of the Senate report we find this paragraph:

In addition, Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1939, which originally transferred the Rural Electrification Administration to the Department of Agriculture, provided that it should be administered by the Administrator under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The courts have held that this authority includes the power of approving or rejecting REA loans. So certainly it is clear to me from the report that with the reorganization order of 1939—that was a long time before this present administration took office—the power was then vested in the Secretary of Agriculture either to approve or reject the proposed loan, and we have operated under that sort of provision ever since 1939.

Mr. BOLLING. Unless I am in error, and I doubt that I am, although I am not familiar with the court decision, the fact remains that not until some considerably later date, after the order I mentioned by the Secretary bringing the review up to the person designated by him, were the loans passed on by any other person than the Administrator of the REA.

My understanding of the Reorganization Act of 1939 was that it was intended to give REA a home. Regardless of what the courts have had to say, the fact remains, as I understand it, that there has never been any supervision by the Secretary of Agriculture over the granting of loans until a date some time after 1954.

Mr. HALLECK. That well may be, but I am not going to challenge the validity or the correctness of the report of this committee. I assume it was gotten up with care by experts who knew what they were talking about. If I can read the English language, it says very clearly that after the reorganization order of 1939 "general direction and supervision" was vested in the Secretary of Agriculture and that gave him the authority of approving or rejecting REA loans. So I insist that on the words of the report itself in this order that they name, that power was vested in the Secretary of Agriculture and it has remained there ever since.

Mr. BOLLING. I will say to the gentleman, finally, that this may be the way one construes the language of the report if one so desires, but in the testimony before the Rules Committee I did not gather that anybody construed the report that way.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have any misgivings about this bill. I am certain that I need not mention that I think all of us are very much aware of the real objective and the real purpose of this bill. But I regret that this bill has been brought here with such haste. It came before the Rules Committee yesterday about 4 o'clock. There were no printed hearings, but my good friend from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Government Operations, was kind enough to give me a proof copy of it. Then this controversial bill comes in here today without any printed hearings for the benefit of the member.

What is the present situation of the bill now before us? Back in 1939 the Reorganization Act gave the Secretary of Agriculture full authority in regard to REA. It gave him the right, the authority, to deny or approve loans. That was the situation then and that is the situation now.

Today we have before us a bill that still will give the Secretary of Agriculture the authority over every phase in the REA except the right to approve or deny loans, which is the most important function of the REA. Now REA means rural electrification. I think it rightfully belongs in the agency of the Secretary of Agriculture. I know that you, Mr. Speaker, would not want to be charged with the full responsibility of administering an agency and then having some subordinate have the authority when it comes to the main function of that agency. I do not think you or I could administer anything under those conditions. It would be parallel to the situation of having our people send us to the Congress and saying, "Now, we think you are a good man. You go down and do this leg work in the departments, but when it comes to the real thing—when it comes to the real thing that counts, and that is voting—you will give that right to your administrative assistant. Let him, your subordinate, perform the important function."

So I say that we cannot and should not saddle the Department, the Secretary of Agriculture, with full authority and responsibility and then take the most important function away from him.

I would like to read the statement of Mr. David Hamil who is the Administrator of the REA. He appeared before the Committee on Government Operations on March 9. Listen to this. This is the subordinate, the one in whom this Congress by this bill now proposes to put in authority in regard to the approval or denial of loans. This is what he said before the committee of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON], on March 9, 1959, when this bill was being considered:

Mr. HAMIL. I have a few brief observations on these matters which are before you.

Secretary Benson has made no change in the organization, authorities, functions, or policies of REA.

The informal procedure whereby proposed supplemental loans in excess of one-half million dollars—now $1 million—and proposed loans to new borrowers are discussed with Mr. Kenneth L. Scott, Director of Agricultural Credit Services, has not resulted in the rejection of a single loan or in any appreciable delay.

In not a single instance has Secretary Benson or Director Scott interfered in the discharge of my responsibilities as Administrator of REA. I make the loans.

For your information, Mr. Chairman, in my absence from the office my very able Deputy, Ralph J. Foreman, who is in the room here, is in charge of REA. On those occasions, he makes the loans. If he and I are both absent, we have three Assistant Administrators who act in that capacity, Roy G. Zook, Robert T. Beall, and Norman McFarlin.

I also have in the room Mr. Charles Samenow, whose title in REA is legislative consultant, and who on many occasions has acted as Administrator and made loans.

While I have been Administrator, not one loan application which met the requirements of the Rural Electrification Act has been rejected. Not one of my loan decisions has been motivated or colored by political considerations.

It is my own considered opinion that REA has prospered in its 20 years in the Department of Agriculture. It is doing well now. The counsel and experience of Secretary Benson and Director Scott have helped me in discharging my duties. I see no need or reason for change. I support fully the position of the Department.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. I do not want to belabor the proposition, but I think it ought to be thoroughly understood that this legislation which is presently before us seeks to undo in part the effect of the reorganization order of 1939 and not the effect of the reorganization order of 1953. I well recall the great struggle we had here to write the first Reorganization Act, and believe me, it was a bitter struggle. But, the very thing that was sought to be accomplished here by that Reorganization Act has been accomplished in this particular instance. Here was an operation involving the farmer, necessarily a part of the overall operation of the Department of Agriculture. The President in 1939 sent this order, vesting in the Secretary of Agriculture, the authority over the Administration, including the power to approve or reject loans. That is the very thing that has been in effect for 20 years, which this legislation now seeks to change.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the gentleman from Indiana.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOLLING] said the issue was interference in the Department by the Secretary of Agriculture. He did not say what interference. I have just read the statement of the Administrator, Mr. Hamil, to whom this bill would turn over the denial or approval of the loan. He does not say there is any interference.

I yield now to anyone who will say that the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson, when the Administrator, Mr. Hamil, approved a loan, ever overrode him by disapproving it.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. DENTON. The order of 1957 provided no loans over a half million dollars could be approved by the Administrator of REA unless also approved by the Secretary of Agriculture. The REA had been very successful in Indiana. The REA's in Indiana buy their electricity from private utilities. About 3 years ago one utility obtained a very unreasonable rate. The more electricity you used the more you had to pay. I think 250 kilowatts was the breaking point. Below that the rate was less; above, it was more. That order has since been changed, but the rate increase is still high. The REA came out and tried to talk to the utilities company and get a reasonable rate. They would not do so. The only thing they could do was to build a powerplant. They undertook to build a powerplant at Petersburg, Ind. They made application for a $42 million loan. The Public Service Commission of Indiana is supposed to pass on the loans, construction of plants, and transportation facilities of the REA's in a judicial capacity. Nevertheless the Governor of Indiana sent the public service commission down to Washington to work against the passage of this enactment. That was the issue in the last campaign, and the people spoke very emphatically about it. They talked to Mr. Benson, and I know Mr. Hamil was there. He was very put out to have them interfere politically with his decision on this loan. But in any event a White House meeting was called thereafter. Sherman Adams presided. I do not know what took place, but after that this informal order of 1957 providing for approval of REA loans over $500,000 by the Secretary of Agriculture was issued. During all the time prior to that the Administrator thought he passed on the loans. That order was issued, and of course this loan has laid dormant ever since.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe the original author of this bill of the other body has said that to his knowledge he does not know of one instance where the Secretary of Agriculture had disapproved a loan that the Administrator had approved.

Mr. DENTON. Yet this order was issued after the White House meeting and I know that loan has lain dormant ever since. It would have put people to work in the coalfields and other industries.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I think the REA has done a splendid job; and I believe it has been clearly demonstrated that Mr. Hamil wants the situation to remain the way it is, that he is satisfied, that he does not want that authority to make loans—I think the passage of this bill would be an insult to the American people and to the splendid way the program has advanced thus far and so rapidly in the past few years; so, Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill is defeated.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH].

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, minority members of the Select Committee on Small Business are this afternoon introducing legislation to amend the Renegotiation Act.

Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that one of the final actions of the 85th Congress was to extend the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended, for an additional 6 months—from its prior expiration date of December 31, 1958, to June 30, 1959—Public Law 85-930, 85th Congress, 2d session.

This action followed a 1-day hearing near the close of the session. The report of the Committee on Ways and Means states that the 6-month extension was decided upon in order to give the Congress a greater opportunity to study proposals either for further amendments to the act or to allow it to terminate. The Ways and Means Committee has announced that it will hold hearings beginning on Monday, April 27, 1959, at which time a more thorough exploration of the subject of contract renegotiation will be undertaken.

SMALL BUSINESS PROPOSALS

The day prior to the 1958 hearing members of the Select Committee on Small Business introduced legislation designed to correct "small business handicaps under the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended." This was a bipartisan and nonpartisan effort to secure consideration for some of the most troublesome small business problems now imbedded in the Renegotiation Act. The introductory remarks which we made last July summarized the purposes of our bill and were made a part of the record of the Ways and Means Committee during the hearings on extension of the act—hearings July 29, 1958, page 14, and those that follow.

It is my hope and understanding that we shall have similar support for small-business renegotiation amendments in the 86th Congress.

The Republican members of the Select Committee on Small Business are today introducing identical bills to amend the Renegotiation Act of 1951, in the interest of small business. These members are Mr. MOORE, of West Virginia; Mr. AVERY, of Kansas; Mr. SMITH, of California; Mr. ROBISON, of New York; Mr. QUIE, of Minnesota; and myself.

We are taking this action today in view of the announcement of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives that public hearings on the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended, will begin on April 27, 1959, in Washington, D.C.

SMALL BUSINESS SKILLS VITAL TO NATIONAL DEFENSE

World War II and the growth of the aircraft industry punctuates the fact that small concerns which are possessed of technical skills and inventiveness are a strong arm of our national defense. We need to keep this large group of small defense contractors in business, and with due consideration for managerial skills, to keep them in a position where the opportunity for profit is present. We are not in favor of subsidies and we know from long experience that small business concerns do not want subsidies either for themselves or their competitors. They want a fair and equal opportunity under the law to do business in a businesslike way and to reap the benefits of their own ingenuity and skill. We believe the present operation of the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended, is a deterrent in many respects to capable small and independent concerns which would participate in our national defense programs.

The Congress of the United States has had a longstanding policy of assuring small and independent concerns a fair share of contract awards for goods and services which are made by the various departments and agencies of the Federal Government, and including national defense contracts.

We are entering a new era in preparing and augmenting our national defense which we refer to generally as the space age. The demands of the space age for increased skills and technical knowledge is recognized by all. We do not believe that a few large concerns can do the complete job. We are convinced that the small concerns who contributed so much to the building of the aircraft industry must be provided with the opportunity and the incentive to keep pace with the tremendous responsibility we all have in keeping America out in front in science and technology.

We feel that our bill is a contribution to that end.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE OPPOSITION TESTIMONY, 1958

The purposes of the bills and the needs of small business as recited by the members of the Small Business Committee last year are as valid today as when the bills were introduced. Opposition was voiced, however, both by Mr. Robert Dechert, general counsel of the Department of Defense, representing that Department, and by the Renegotiation Board, represented by its Chairman, Mr. Thomas Coggeshall. The criticisms made by Messrs. Dechert and Coggeshall deserve consideration and they are in part responsible for the changes in the proposed small business amendments now offered. The purposes remain the same. We believe improved legislative language has been developed to overcome that portion of past criticism which appears to have merit.

In amending the Renegotiation Act of 1951 our bill proposes to provide certain definite assistance to a large number of small but strategic concerns engaged in work pertaining to the national defense. We propose through the enactment of our amendments, first, to encourage subcontracting in Government procurement to provide incentives for small and independent business concerns; second, to encourage prime contractors and subcontractors to subcontract the maximum proportion of their contracts and subcontracts to provide the proper profit motives for small and independent business concerns as the cornerstone of our free enterprise system; and third, to expand the Government procurement base by providing incentives and encouragement to small and independent business concerns.

In adopting the amendments we propose that the Congress reaffirm its longstanding policy of assuring to small and independent business concerns a more substantial proportion of the contract awards by the Federal Government.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF SUBCONTRACTING

Section 2 of our bill is designed to encourage large prime contractors to attain the maximum in subcontracting to smaller concerns. It reads:

SEC. 2. Section 103(e) of the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended (setting forth factors to be taken into account in determining whether profits are excessive), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"In determining excessive profits, favorable recognition must be given to economies achieved through contracting with small business concerns (as defined pursuant to section 3 of the Small Business Act); and a contratcor or subcontractor who achieves economies through the programs of the Department of Defense, the Small Business Administration, or any other agency of the Government, to increase the share of such small business concerns in procurement, shall, subject to other considerations set forth in this subsection, be provided incentive awards through proportionately higher profit alowances."

This proposal is identical to the proposal of last year except that it is also made applicable to agencies other than the Department of Defense—such as the National Aeronautics and Space Agency—whose procurement programs are also subject to the act.

A NECESSARY AMENDMENT

Last year Mr. Coggeshall objected to the foregoing proposed amendment claiming it to be unnecessary because the Renegotiation Board has now revised its own regulations to include section 1460.14(b)(3), which reads as follows:

(i) Defense production needs and the policy of Congress require that subcontracting, particularly to small business concerns, be used to the maximum extent practicable. Although a contractor who subcontracts work may not reasonably expect to be allowed as large a profit thereon as if it had done the work itself, subcontracting of the kind described in this subparagraph, especially the extent to which subcontracts are placed with small business concerns, will be given favorable consideration in the renegotiation of the contractor.

(ii) A contractor will be given favorable treatment when, by subcontracting, it utilizes in the defense effort facilities and services, particularly of small business concerns, which might otherwise have been overlooked or passed by; when it has demonstrated efficiency and ingenuity in finding appropriate opportunities for subcontracting; when the amount of subcontracting so accomplished is substantial; when the amount or complexity of technical, engineering, and other assistance rendered by the contractor to the subcontractor is substantial; and when the price negotiated with the subcontractor is reasonable in view of the components produced.

The Board is to be complimented on having added this provision to its regulations, a substantial improvement, and if it were not for the phrase in the above regulation reading "may not reasonably expect to be allowed as large a profit thereon," we might agree that our proposed amendment to the Renegotiation Act is not needed. We feel, however, that the amendment we propose contains a very important shift of emphasis which is required for guidance of the Board and for incentive to industry. Our amendment indicates that a proportionately higher profit allowance should be given as a reward to a contractor who achieves economies through a small business subcontracting program. We believe it is the desire of the Congress to make clear that a contractor who saves on total cost to the Government by effecting economical subcontracts with small business should not suffer even a little penalty, as the wording of the Board's regulation implies, but rather should be rewarded by sharing in the savings effected. This can only be accomplished by recognition that a proportionately higher profit allowance such as we propose is a more likely inducement than the prospect of a reduced penalty which is all that may be now inferred in reading the Board's present policy as quoted above.

MINIMUM AMOUNTS SUBJECT TO RENEGOTIATION AND EXEMPTION OF CERTAIN TYPE CONTRACTS

In respect to our proposal to increase the minimum dollar amount subject to renegotiation and certain contract exemptions, our bill proposes that:

SEC. 3. (a) Section 105(f)(1) of the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended (setting forth minimum amounts subject to renegotiation), is amended (1) by inserting ", or $5,000,000, in the case of a fiscal year ending after June 30, 1959" immediately after "1956" each place it appears; and (2) by adding at the end thereof the following: "For the purpose of determining, pursuant to the first sentence of this paragraph, whether or not the receipts or accruals from such contracts and subcontracts shall be renegotiated for any fiscal year, there shall be excluded amounts received or accrued from—

"(A) any fixed price of incentive-type contract or subcontract if such contract or subcontract, by its terms, is subject to price redetermination or price revision; and

"(B) any contract or subcontract awarded at a fixed price to the lowest acceptable bidder as a result of competitive bidding in which three or more responsive and competitive bidders have taken part."

(b) Section 105(f)(3) of the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended (relating to determination of amounts subject to renegotiation), is amended (1) by inserting ", the $5,000,000 amount" immediately after "the $1,000,000 amount" in the second sentence; and (2) by striking out "$1,000,000" each place it appears in the last sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,000,000".

MINIMUM AMOUNT SUBJECT TO RENEGOTIATION

In our statement of July 1958 we said that "the 1956 amendments to the Renegotiation Act, in part, were of some benefit to smaller manufacturers, since the act was amended by increasing the minimum amount subject to renegotiation from $500,000 to $1 million", and this "probably should now be increased to $5 million, since rising labor and material costs have somewhat nullified the beneficial effects of the million-dollar exemption"—hearings, page 14, Ways and Means Committee, July 29, 1958.

We further stated that:

We are of the opinion that the only value of renegotiation will be found in its application to the hundred or so largest military contractors who traditionally serve as sole source—noncompetitive—suppliers on complex items of defense material. For all other companies where competition is present, renegotiation serves little purpose other than to increase the burdens of accounting and administration. An examination of the records of the Renegotiation Board would reflect that the bulk of the dollars recaptured come from the top 100 defense contracting firms and that only meager sums are recovered from the smaller defense contractors. For this reason we think the country would be better off if the minimum amount were raised as high as $5 million. At the same time, we would not press for such an amendment because there is not sufficient time to gather the detailed evidence necessary to prove the point. Therefore, it has not been included in our bill.

Data from the Board's records can assuredly be secured for consideration during this session of the Congress and the breakdown of total recoveries from firms doing less than $5 million of defense work annually can be secured to back up the contention that these account for a minor portion of recoveries. It will be obvious that the extent of paperwork and special recordkeeping bears most heavily on firms in the under $5 million category.

UNDER $5 MILLION MEANS SMALL BUSINESS

Businessmen have stated that it is a "fact of life" in manufacturing that a company must have total sales at a minimum level of $10,000 to $12,000 per employee in order to survive. Hence, it is possible that a company with 100 employees must make total sales of about $1,200,000 or find itself in the red. Conversely, a company with more than 500 employees must have sales of around $6 million, or more. Thus, the exemption of $5 million for companies engaged in defense work will apply almost exclusively to small businesses. A few large companies, of course, would be among those who are primarily manufacturers of commercial products, firms whose defense sales are a secondary and minor part of their total activity. It will be observed, however, that sales at such levels will be outside the realm of the "sole source—noncompetitive—suppliers of complex items" mentioned in our statement last year. Whenever a large firm's participation in defense work is at a level below $5 million it will almost always be in the area of supply and support items—blankets, clothing, detergents, typewriters, and so forth—where contracts are awarded by competitive bid and competitive restraints provide ample protection against excessive profit.

EXEMPTION OF CERTAIN TYPES OF CONTRACTS

Referring back to section 3 of our bill covering "minimum amounts" and "contract exemptions," we recognize that the chief criticism directed against our bill—H.R. 13561 and those that follow, 85th Congress, 2d session—arose from the proposal to fully exempt certain types of contracts in the manner then proposed. Specifically, the language of the 1958 proposal read:

(10) Any fixed price or incentive type contract or subcontract, except at the option of the contractor or subcontractor, if such contract or subcontract, by its terms, is subject to price redetermination or price revision; or

(11) Any contract or subcontract which has been the subject of competitive bidding, except at the option of the contractor or subcontractor, if such contract has been awarded to the low bidder among three or more responsive and competitive bidders.

In stating opposition to this proposal to the Members of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. Dechert of the Defense Department made two observations. He said:

If a contractor or subcontractor takes a small profit or a loss on a contract or subcontract, he may elect, for purposes of setoff, to submit the contract or subcontract to the renegotiation process along with his other renegotiable business. * * * On the other hand, if the profits of a particular contract or subcontract are large, he may elect to exempt that contract or subcontract from renegotiation. Such a provision does not appear desirable.

Since this option to include or exclude would have applied to all contracts of the types noted for the largest as well as the smallest defense contractors, we have concluded that it might have placed some of the larger firms in a heads-I-win-tails-you-lose position—particularly, in one of those rare occasions where an attractive profit did arise from one of the types of contracts listed. That an excessive profit could arise in such a contract held by a small company seems next to impossible—first, because the total amount of the contract would necessarily be small; second, because the restraint of competitive bidding would preclude it in contracts awarded by such means; and finally, because the procedures of price redetermination would effectively trim any prospective excess profit out of the remaining contracts covered by this proposal.

It would be equally unfair, however, to attempt to correct this potential deficiency in the amendment proposal merely by eliminating the contractor option, that is, by making the exclusions of such contracts mandatory. To do so would be to remove from the weighing process of renegotiation any consideration of those contracts which are most likely to result in skimpy profits or perhaps losses. It would violate the principles of the act which permit, as we have noted, "a contractor's total business to be weighed in the balance, rather than merely to recover excess profits on successful contracts and ignore others."

Both Mr. Dechert and Mr. Coggeshall took note of this need. As Mr. Dechert indicated:

> The renegotiation process applies, and properly so, to all contracts across the board.

And during his part in the hearing, Mr. Coggeshall stated:

> I believe very strongly that if you are to have renegotiation, it is only fair to the contractor that you look at the results of the defense dollar, rather than just a particular contract. If we go back to the history, the very first act in 1942 just provided for renegotiation contract by contract, and it ended up that there was a great holler, because in the contracts in which they found excessive profits there was no offset of those which had low profits or losses.

AN EQUITABLE SOLUTION BY THE REVISION OF SECTION 3 OF OUR PRESENT PROPOSALS

In place of an optional exclusion of price redeterminable or competitively awarded fixed-price contracts—or a substitute mandatory exclusion—both circumstances which appear to have some defects, our study over the past year has led us to a substitute proposal the benefits of which will be confined almost exclusively to small business.

The essence of the proposal is this: Since price redeterminable contracts and other fixed-price contracts awarded as the result of competitive bidding are automatically subject to restraints which assure against excessive profits to small business, we propose that the receipts from such contracts be excluded only in determining whether a contractor shall be subject to renegotiation. However, if the combined receipts from other types of contracts—sole-source fixed price, cost-reimbursable, and so forth—on which excessive profits are more likely to arise exceed the proposed new minimum amount, then the contractor will be subject to renegotiation and the process will, as heretofore, be applied "across the board."

This proposal would in no way affect any of the larger defense contractors. They would have to do all but $5 million of their total defense business in the specific low-profit forms of contract delineated in order to gain exemption from the act—a near impossibility, but a blessing to the public purse if it should come about. In fact, for the middle-size companies, those firms doing perhaps $15 to $20 million per year in defense contracts, this proposal would create a very strong incentive to seek the low-profit forms of contract in an effort to gain possible exemption. We can only conclude that the result would produce a true economy in the defense effort while, at the time, removing an excessive burden from thousands of small firms who seldom engage in contracting except in these low-profit forms.

See exact language of our new proposal above as part of section 3.

For example, for a company to determine whether it will be subject to renegotiation after this proposed amendment, it will add its recipients and accruals from all other types of contracts—negotiated-firm-fixed-price, cost-reimbursable, fixed-fee or target-fee, and so forth—and if such receipts and accruals exceed the minimum amount, then the company will be subject to renegotiation on its entire business, including the types of contracts in (A) and (B), above.

BENEFITS OF OUR AMENDMENTS TO SMALL BUSINESS

First. Nearly all small businesses will be excluded from the direct effects of renegotiation.

Second. Small- and medium-size businesses will have strong incentive to seek the types of contracts which have built-in restraints against excessive profits.

Third. Excessive and burdensome recordkeeping will be eliminated for thousands of small companies.

Fourth. The uncertainties of waiting 2, 3, or more years for final action on renegotiation will be eliminated for the small firms least able to cope with this problem.

Fifth. Since the total caseload of the Renegotiation Board will automatically be reduced, fairer and faster action may be anticipated by the remaining large companies who will continue to be subject to the act.

COMMERCIAL ARTICLE EXEMPTION—SECTION 4

It is felt that the proposal contained in our bills in the 85th Congress—H.R. 13561 and its companion bills of 1958—was a fair and necessary proposal and that the same amendment should be offered at this time. The requirements of the present act are grossly unfair to small firms whose products compete directly with commercial type items of other firms but whose markets—because of location or sales pattern—are directed primarily to defense users.

A typical example is that of a fastener manufacturer who competes directly with the products of all other fastener manufacturers in the country. His prices are dependent upon the prices charged by his competitors for their own wares. This is true even though the design and shape of a specific fastener may vary to a noticeable degree from a competitively offered product. This means that the buyer will weigh both price and prospective merits of the separate products of different sources of supply.

Yet the large competitor—with national distribution—is automatically exempted from the act because he is able to show that more than 35 percent of the sales of this item are to nondefense users. While the smaller firm, whose effort is concentrated in meeting defense needs, remains subject to the act because he does not have ability to develop nondefense markets through a program of national advertising and distribution and because he cannot show 35 percent of nondefense sales as to each separate article.

It is difficult to believe that Board objection to this proposal can be regarded as anything more than a self-perpetuating interest in maintaining domination over an area of business in which little, if any, recovery of so-called excess profits can be demonstrated.

MANDATORY EXEMPTIONS FOR STANDARD COMMERCIAL ARTICLES AND SERVICES

The language of the proposed amendment, which is the same as last year's proposals, is as follows:

> SEC. 4. Section 106(e)(4)(B) of the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended (relating to mandatory exemption for standard commercial articles and services), is amended to read as follows:
>
> "(B) the term 'standard commercial article' means, with respect to any fiscal year, an article—
>
> "(i) which either is customarily maintained in stock by the contractor or subcontractor or is offered for sale in accordance with a price schedule regularly maintained by the contractor or subcontractor, and
> "(ii) which two or more competitors can be shown to maintain in stock, or which is substantially similar to articles which two or more competitors offer for sale in accordance with regularly established price lists;."

SUPPLEMENTARY COMMENT ON DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE COMMENTARY WAYS AND MEANS HEARINGS, JULY 29, 1958

With respect to the proposed exclusion of contracts awarded as the result of competitive bidding in determining whether a contractor shall be subject to the act, a comment by Mr. Dechert of the Department of Defense, although no longer directly applicable, should not go unanswered.

Mr. Dechert said that competitive bidding "in the field of complex items where costs cannot be accurately forecast do not guarantee against excessive profits." He added that:

> In the field of aircraft, for example, perhaps three or more companies would actually bid in connection with a proposed contract for the development and production of a complex piece of equipment. This does not mean that the successful bid is based on accurate cost estimates. In the procurement of complex equipment, competition does not necessarily guarantee against excessive profits.

With due respect to Mr. Dechert, the competition to which he refers never is on the basis of a firm fixed price to the low bidder. In fact, firm fixed price bids are regarded as impossible "for the development and production of a complex piece of equipment," for the very reason he states, the inability to make accurate cost estimates. Such competition is actually conducted as a competitive negotiation, evaluation being on the basis of proposals—not fixed price bids—which present varying approaches to problems of design, engineering, manufacture, and so forth, plus an estimate of cost and a proposed management fee. Such negotiated contracts would not have been excluded by the amendment proposed last year, nor would they be excluded from the computation provided for in this year's proposal.

We respectfully urge the Committee on Ways and Means to give serious and sympathetic consideration to our proposals.

Finally, we would like to call to the attention of the Members an editorial appearing in the Wall Street Journal on August 4, 1958, on the Renegotiation Act of 1951:

LOADED LANGUAGE

One of the troubles with the current debate over the Renegotiation Act for Government contracts is that it is wrapped up in some emotion-laden language.

This is the law which permits the Government, having once made a contract with a manufacturer to supply goods at a certain price, to later "renegotiate" it and reduce the amount it has agreed to pay. The law is usually described as one designed to recapture "excessive profits" on defense contracts.

Now "negotiation" is a respectable word and "excessive profits" a disreputable phrase. Almost everyone is opposed to the latter and in favor of the former. So a proposal to negotiate away excessive profits has a hard time getting any hard discussion.

But before Congress leaps into extending this wartime measure it ought to frankly recognize that this "renegotiation" in practice is pretty much unilateral. One party in the negotiation, the manufacturer, has a pistol at his head. This is especially true of industries, like aircraft manufacturing, that are heavily dependent on Government business. As a practical matter, the law simply means that the Government can later change its mind on what it agreed to.

And "excessive profits" is a phrase with no definable meaning. There are those who think any profit excessive, and some who think thus are no strangers to Government service. In practice it has come to mean any profit a manufacturer makes over and above what the Government now thinks he ought to have made.

Quite apart from that, there is room for a little thought about the familiar wartime attitude of "hang the costs" of making this-or-that; that attitude certainly wasn't discouraged by the knowledge that if costs were held down the Government would simply "renegotiate" any savings away from the manufacturer.

Nothing is so likely to spur economy and efficiency in operation as a reward for it; nothing discourages it like the knowledge that lower costs will profit the manufacturer nothing. It is not at all unlikely that a renegotiation law generally applied could increase the Government's cost of buying things.

At any rate, we think before Congress approves the bill out of habit it might reflect that it is endorsing a practice by the U.S. Government that would hardly be tolerated in any other buyer.

The text of our proposed amendments follows:

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MEADER].

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, I have opposed any effort to amend existing law as to responsibilities within the Department of Agriculture for the Rural Electrification Administration, as outlined in H.R. 1321.

My position was stated clearly in Additional Views to House Report 235, filed March 20, of this year. H.R. 1321 modifying Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953, adopts an erroneous principle of administration. Instead of tightening controls and establishing clear channels of authority and responsibility it moves in the opposite direction of fragmentation and dispersal of functions and responsibility.

The Hoover Commission, in its report on general management of the executive branch, had this to say:

The President, and under him his chief lieutenants, the department heads, must be held responsible and accountable to the people and the Congress for the conduct of the executive branch. Responsibility and accountability are impossible without authority—the power to direct. The exercise of authority is impossible without a clear line of command from the top to the bottom and a return line of responsibility and accountability from the bottom to the top.

Continuing:

Under the President the heads of departments must hold full responsibility for the conduct of their departments. There must be a clear line of authority reaching down through every step of the organization and no subordinate should have authority independent from that of his superior. Each department head should receive from the Congress administrative authority to organize his department and to place him in control of its administration.

Even further:

We recommend that the department head should be given authority to determine the organization within his department.

Now, if we continue to create autonomous administrations outside; or even inside, executive departments, administrative chaos is the inevitable result. The department head—a member of the Cabinet—and the President will lose control over the operations for which the administration is responsible.

Likewise the Congress will find it difficult, if not impossible to examine and control the operations of a multitude of autonomous, uncoordinated administrative activities.

The Hoover Commission concluded:

We have urged in our first report that the foundation of good departmental administration is that the Secretary shall have authority from the Congress to organize and control his organization, and that separate authorities to subordinates be eliminated.

Proper administration requires further tightening of authority and establishment of clearer channels of command, not in their diffusion as will be accomplished by H.R. 1321.

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1321) to amend Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 1321, with Mr. BOLLING in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], will be recognized for 1 hour and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I might consume.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before the Committee, H.R. 1321, has two purposes. First, to restore to the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration the authority to approve or disapprove loans to be made under the Rural Electrification Act of 1936. This loanmaking authority will not be subject to the supervision, direction, or any other control by the Secretary of Agriculture. This is made clear in the language of the bill as amended by the Committee. The bill states that all of the functions and operations of the Department and the Administrator shall be exercised and administered within the Department of Agriculture by such Administrator under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture. Up to this point it follows the language of the 1939 Reorganization Act. Then there is added the following to make it explicit as to what the purpose of the legislation is:

Except that insofar as such functions relate to the approval or disapproval of loans authorized to be made under the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, as amended, their exercise by the Administrator shall not be subject to the supervision or direction of, or to any other control by, the Secretary of Agriculture.

The language is quite clear on intent.

The second purpose is to reestablish in the Rural Electrification Administration functions which it had prior to the passage of Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 and to modify the effect of that plan and the 1939 plan so that the Secretary of Agriculture will not be able to distribute the functions of REA and diversify them to other departments or officials within the Department of Agriculture.

We want to maintain the REA as an identifiable unit within the Department of Agriculture under the general supervision and direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, except when it comes to functions of loans. In that case the Administrator shall have the authority, without review or general supervision of the Secretary, to make or approve a loan.

The reasons for this legislation are very, very clear, and the issue is very, very simple. You can take your choice of administration. The bill proposes one way; others would have it the way it is. For my own part, I will take the legislation here recommended for reasons that are manifest.

In the consideration of the language of this bill and the reasons why this change should be made, I point out to you certain facts. First of all, under the operations of the Department and the Administrator under the reorganization plan of 1939, there were no orders, written or unwritten; no regulations, written or unwritten, that dealt with the administration of the Rural Electrification Administration or the Administrator in making his loans under the theory of the 1939 reorganization plan. The language of that plan stated this specifically:

SEC. 5. Department of Agriculture—Rural Electrification Administration transfer: The Rural Electrification Administration and its functions and activities are hereby transferred to the Department of Agriculture and shall be administered in that Department by the Administrator of Rural Electrification Administration under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.

That is the way it operated until Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 came along, which was a general plan of operation involving not just the REA. And it is significant to note the change that took place immediately or shortly thereafter when this plan went into operation.

You find under the purview of the authority of reorganization plan of 1953 that all of the functions and operations of the REA are now transferred and rest in the Secretary of Agriculture, a tremendous difference in the concept of operation from the plan of 1939. The proof of the pudding is in the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture himself, acting under the purview of the 1953 reorganization plan, for the first time issued a regulation or order directing that all of the functions which had been transferred to him under the reorganization plan were, in turn, transferred right back to the Administrator of REA.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FASCELL. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. EVINS. I would just like to interrupt the gentleman, who is making such an excellent talk, and say when this power was delegated to the Secretary, did he not propose to transfer it to a central agency, after he had promised the Congress that if any changes were to be made he would consult the Congress, and he failed to do so?

Mr. FASCELL. I believe the gentleman is correct, and that is in line with the facts which I will discuss in just a moment. I thank the gentleman for bringing that out.

As I say, the proof of the pudding, under the operation of the 1953 act, lies in the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture issued an order transferring all of the power and authority back to the Administrator of the REA for its operation, reserving unto himself, the Secretary, however, as the law required him to do, the right to take those privileges and functions back if he so saw fit. This is all covered in the testimony which will be found in the hearings held last year and this year on the same subject. As a matter of fact, then, under the 1953 plan from a practical standpoint, we had the REA as an identifiable unit in the Department of Agriculture operating independently, although technically and legally that would not be the case. And, everything went along fine; you heard no complaints about REA loans until when? In May 1957 or thereabouts, when suddenly comes to light for the first time a so-called informal loan review procedure. Now, mind you, it was not in writing; there was no written legislation, and yet it is a substantial procedural operation within the Department which heretofore had not existed. Now, you can draw your own inferences from that as far as I am concerned. Nevertheless I will state, as the testimony before the committee bears out, that this was purely an informal or oral arrangement. The new arrangement simply meant that whereas theretofore the Administrator of REA had the actual sole approval and authority of the granting or disapproval of a loan, that thereafter, on those loans which were in excess of $500,000, that they would then be subject to review by the Director of Farm Credit Services before the fact of final approval by the REA Administrator. I would call to your attention the specific testimony, and I believe it is important because it bears on the fact of which way you will choose to have REA operated and why this legislation is now before you. In the hearings on the legislation this year beginning on page 35, there is an examination by me of Mr. Scott, the Director of the Farm Credit Services, and I leave you to draw your own inferences from the testimony as to what changes had taken place in the loan operation of REA and why:

On page 4, Mr. Scott, you make the statement that the Administrator's authority for final approval of loans was and is not curtailed. Then you follow that up, however, by saying that you have an informal arrangement whereby loans in excess of $1 million are reviewed by you.

Mr. SCOTT. That is correct.

Mr. FASCELL. Isn't that a modification of the Administrator's authority?

Mr. SCOTT. He received the delegation of authority from the Secretary when he was appointed to run the Rural Electrification Administration under the act, and to take actions on loans. That was not interfered with in any way. I have no authority to approve or deny loans. That authority has always been and is now in the Administrator. I review some of them. As to any application where I have any points that I think might well be brought to the attention of the Administrator, I do that. Never in any sense have I indicated that he should turn it down or approve it.

Mr. FASCELL. If this informal arrangement is not a modification of the authority of the Administrator, what is its purpose?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, it is largely to keep the Secretary's office informed, and me particularly, so that I can bring to the attention of the Secretary any points about the program of any nature that I think would be in keeping with his responsibilities.

Mr. FASCELL. If the Administrator had a direct delegation of authority under the Reorganization Act from the Secretary of Agriculture, why wouldn't he be automatically informed as to everything that is going on in this Department?

Mr. SCOTT. You mean the Secretary be automatically informed?

Mr. FASCELL. Yes. Isn't the REA Administrator a part of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, yes, indeed.

Mr. FASCELL. Then why would you have to have an informal procedure to keep the Secretary advised? He is under the direct supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, is he not?

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. FASCELL. Then this informal arrangement is evidently to accomplish something else.

Mr. SCOTT. No; it is not.

Mr. FASCELL. Then I still don't understand the reason for the informal arrangement.

Mr. SCOTT. The pattern of operation in the Department of Agriculture is to have the several bureaus or agencies under the supervision and direction of a staff member, the Under Secretary and the Assistant Secretaries, and myself, and the administrative assistant, Mr. Roberts.

Mr. FASCELL. Now, sir, you are Director of Agricultural Credit Services?

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. FASCELL. Under ordinary operation in the chain of command wouldn't Mr. Hamil's department be under your supervision and direction?

Mr. Hamil is the Administrator of REA.

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. FASCELL. Then if that is true, why the necessity of expressing specifically an informal arrangement dealing with a particular amount of loans? You have jurisdiction over everything he does, don't you?

Mr. SCOTT. That is correct, but in any lending operation the way to keep in touch with the loan requirements out in the country, and the specific needs in the REA systems, to find out what their requirements are, what their progress is, and their estimates of future growth, and so on, you get that best from review of the loan dockets.

Mr. Chairman, I am going at length into this testimony because I believe it develops very clearly between the Administrator and the Director of the Farm Credit Services and myself in this interrogation exactly what the issue is. I continue quoting from the hearings:

Mr. FASCELL. I will agree with you, Mr. Scott, but couldn't you do that before you had this informal loan arrangement?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. FASCELL. All right, then, what are you doing now under the informal arrangement that you weren't doing before the informal arrangement?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, it is an opportunity in an orderly way to look at the loan folders. I didn't look at very many loan folders before. It was an arrangement to have these larger loans come across my desk, to keep me informed as to what the situation is.

Mr. FASCELL. In other words, what you are telling me, as I understand it, is the practice in the Department was, prior to the time that this informal arrangement was set up, that nobody reviewed Mr. Hamil's activities. For all intents and purposes, he was an independent operation, even though he was under the direction, supervision, and in the chain of command which flowed through you to the Secretary; so that there would be no misunderstanding about a definite review practice being established, you set up this informal review basis, even though you had the authority prior to that time to do the same thing?

Mr. SCOTT. That is right. Mr. Hamil and his predecessor, Mr. Nelson, and I frequently talked about matters, but this was thought to be a more orderly way and a very simple way for me to keep in touch with the problems and progress of the system out through the country.

Mr. FASCELL. I am still at a loss and I can't understand why it is necessary to have a particular administrative procedure identified as such when you had the authority to do the same thing all along.

This gives rise to speculation, at least, if not actual fact, that something is now being done that wasn't done before, and in order to do that you had to specify it even though it is informally.

I don't see how you can escape that, and this is, by the way, an oral proposition, there is no written regulation or directive?

Mr. SCOTT. That is correct.

Mr. FASCELL. So we have the same situation today as we did the last time we discussed this matter. Do I understand, Mr. Scott, that under the present procedure of this informal arrangement that Mr. Hamil has a completed docket prior to the time he comes to you, if it is in excess of $1 million?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. FASCELL. And when the matter is brought to you, has he decided what action should be taken before it comes to you?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, I don't attempt to find out whether he has or has not. As a matter of fact, I am quite sure that sometimes I see the loan before he does. These dockets represent the judgment of his staff people, including the men that work there in the General Counsel's office.

Mr. FASCELL. Maybe I better direct my questions to Mr. Hamil; would you inform me what the procedure is now. If a docket is presented, and I assume that it is a file folder, it starts out with the basic application and then goes with their—with staff studies, and what not, stuck on top of it?

Mr. HAMIL. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. FASCELL. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Is the gentleman reading from the hearings of 1958 or from the hearings of 1959, which have not been printed and are not available to the House? As far as the minority is concerned, they are not available here. From which hearings is the gentleman reading?

Mr. FASCELL. As I stated when I started, I began reading on page 35 of the printed hearings of 1959 on the legislation.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. They just came over, I understand, and were delivered today. We have not even had an opportunity to read them.

Mr. FASCELL. However, you have had the galley proofs for a long time. Now, to continue with the testimony I was reading:

Mr. FASCELL. And finally somebody gets around to putting a final sheet of paper on top of it which says yes or no, Mr. Hamil; is that what you do?

Mr. HAMIL. I sign all loan dockets. That makes it a legal instrument, and in my absence, as I told you a minute ago, I delegate the authority. Let me put it this way: No loan has ever gone to Mr. Scott's desk that I didn't intend to make. I have made every one of them that went to Mr. Scott's desk.

Mr. FASCELL. That doesn't answer my question.

Mr. HAMIL. Well, what do you want, Mr. FASCELL?

Mr. FASCELL. I can appreciate what you are telling me. I have no quarrel with that. All I am trying to find out now is whether or not you actually, in writing, take final action on a loan prior to the time it is submitted for review.

Mr. HAMIL. I have in many cases. I can any time I want to.

Mr. FASCELL. All right.

Mr. HAMIL. I am the Administrator, Mr. Congressman, and I can sign those dockets any time I want to.

Mr. FASCELL. When you say sign a docket, just what does that mean; tell me.

Mr. HAMIL. That makes it a legal document obligating the United States of America.

Mr. FASCELL. In other words, it is the final paper which indicates that the applicant is entitled to the money?

Mr. HAMIL. Yes, it is a commitment, Congressman. There may be a stop order provision saying that the borrower must meet certain qualifications before we will release the funds.

Mr. FASCELL. I see. But for all intents and purposes it is the final commitment?

Mr. HAMIL. Yes.

Mr. FASCELL. Now, all I am trying to establish is the procedure. Do I understand that the final commitment in all cases involving $1 million is or is not signed by you prior to submission for review under this informal arrangement you have?

Mr. HAMIL. Basically, they have not been signed before I send them over.

Mr. FASCELL. All right, then, any loans for $1 million are submitted to you and then they are signed by you?

Mr. HAMIL. Yes.

Mr. FASCELL. That is the procedure?

Mr. HAMIL. Yes, as Mr. Scott has told you, Mr. Congressman, it has been an informal procedure for discussion purposes. This is no small amount we are dealing with.

Mr. FASCELL. I didn't say it was. I don't mean to be derogatory at all. Now, isn't it a fact, Mr. Hamil, prior to 1957, when the first informal arrangement was made, that the final commitment was signed by you without prior review?

Mr. HAMIL. I discussed many loans with Mr. Scott prior to that.

I am still bearing on the question because I want a direct answer.

Mr. FASCELL. I am sure you did, and with other people, but the basic difference between your operation prior to 1957 and today is that in those loans under which this informal arrangement applied, you do not actually sign the final commitment until after the review has been made?

Mr. HAMIL. That is basically right.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to tie that testimony in with a little bit of testimony that came out of the last hearings, and I refer to page 206 of the hearings on the legislation in the last year, when a similar bill was before the committee.

Again the interrogation was of Mr. Scott by Mr. Lanigan, and I quote from page 206:

Mr. LANIGAN. I just wanted to get back to this construction that you had—this discussion you had, whether you would review the loans before they were made rather than after they were made.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. LANIGAN. Why were you to review them before?

Mr. SCOTT. Well—

And this is the issue, as I see it—

Well, if you are going to have any influence on policies on a loan, certainly the time to discuss it is before the loan is made.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know how you can document any clearer than that what the intent is, and what the change is that has taken place in the operation of the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration within the Department of Agriculture under the procedure that exists under the reorganization plan of 1953 and the Secretary of Agriculture's loan-review policy.

Now, it has been said, and it probably will be said, that by this bill we are starting some kind of precedent which is an administrative monstrosity. I would say in answer to that, and I point this out in the affirmative discussion on this legislation, that when Congress set up the REA with the policies inherent in that legislation, they provided that an Administrator should be elected for a 10-year term. Everybody here understands why that was done. It was to free the Administrator from outside pressure. All we are seeking to do in this legislation is to be sure that even though certain administrative changes have been made which are a benefit for accounting purposes and budget purposes and personnel purposes and other administrative purposes, we do not destroy the original intent that Congress had in setting up this act as far as the independent loan actions of the Administrator are concerned; and we do not inflict upon his independent judgment any policies or criteria which were not spelled out by the Congress in that act. That is all we mean to say.

The same procedure with respect to the independence of units within a department exists in other cases. They are spelled out in the reports. There is nothing unusual about it. Other officers are given independence with respect to certain functions in which they have the sole authority despite the fact that they are in a chain of administrative command in a larger department.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I submit there is a very real reason that since 1957 there has been considerable question around the country with the REA's and the cooperatives all of whom support the legislation. I believe it is well founded. I believe this legislation provides a moderate approach to correct that problem, and I submit it should be adopted.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FASCELL. I yield.

Mr. McGOVERN. I want to associate myself with the very fine remarks that the gentleman from Florida has just made. In that connection, a few minutes ago, it was charged by the distinguished minority leader in citing the committee report, for authority, that the report stated the 1939 act had actually transferred the loanmaking authority from the Administrator of the REA to the Secretary of Agriculture, but in reading the report since that time, it becomes clear to me, and I think to the gentleman, that the report says just the opposite.

If you will turn to page 3 of the committee report, this is what we read:

While the 1939 plan transferred the functions and activities of the Rural Electrification Administration to the Department of Agriculture, it continued the administration of these functions and activities in the Administrator of Rural Electrification Administration.

Mr. FASCELL. I thank the gentleman for pointing out what the committee report had to say, and I certainly agree in that analysis of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] has consumed 25 minutes.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] is recognized.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of attention to my very able and very learned colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], for whom I have gained a great admiration and respect and also a great deal of affection throughout the time we have been serving together. He is indeed a very, very able pleader at the bar. I want to congratulate him upon being skillful enough to present a bad case in a rather favorable light to this body.

I would like to discuss with you, if I may, for a little while some facts about this situation and about this legislation, and about the background of the Rural Electric Administration.

In the first place, I think it should be written indelibly in the RECORD of this House at this time that a great majority of the membership of this body on both sides of the aisle support the idea and the ideals of the REA. I think it should be made clear that I have throughout the years of service in Congress, and it has been a long, long time, as most of you know, supported REA appropriations and all beneficial laws for the purpose for which REA and later the telephone arrangement under REA were enacted.

I think it should also be made clear in the very beginning that the present administration now in control of the executive branch of the Government has been very much interested in the welfare of REA and interested in the services it has rendered.

In this connection I would like to point out as a matter of record and as a matter of fact that during the 6 years of the present administration, from 1953 through 1958, there was $1,545 million Federal funds made available for REA purposes, while during the 17½ years, or nearly 18 years in which our Democratic friends controlled the administration there was a total sum of $2,954 million made available for the use of REA.

I refer to the minority report which appears on page 25. May I express the hope that before you vote on this particular measure you at least take the time to read the hearings. They are available just now. They came in after I took my seat at the table in charge of this bill; and that you read the report, and especially the minority report. The facts are that when REA was established back in 1936 it was created as an independent agency of the Government, coming under the direction and control of the Office of President of the United States. President Roosevelt back in 1939, realizing the pressures that were upon him because of this great multitude of independent agencies that had been placed under the Office of the President, in Reorganization Plan No. 2, which was submitted to Congress at that time by him, requested that this independent agency be transferred and put under the jurisdiction, direction and control of the Secretary of Agriculture.

There was no opposition to the reorganization plan submitted by President Roosevelt by those Members who oppose this bill today and who served here then.

A little later came the first Hoover Commission, which was instituted by a unanimous vote of both the House and the Senate to act as an arm of the Congress. In their findings reported to the Congress and to the President they said we should transfer more of these independent agencies out of the Office of the President of the United States to the different Cabinet officials for operational purposes, for supervision, so that the President himself would not be required to pass upon these matters.

You and I are practical people; I see some of my friends today who are very realistic in politics. I do not believe anyone will contend that when a so-called independent agency is placed under the President of the United States that the President of the United States and the White House Office does not have something to say about the policies that are followed and the actions that are taken by the heads of these independent agencies. So, really, when we get down to cases, when we discuss this situation realistically as men and women who have had some experience in public life, persons who are not as naive as my friend from Florida would like to have some people believe, it does not make too much difference in the end, in the summation, whether it is the Secretary of Agriculture or the President of the United States who may be consulted, who may review, who may take a look at the loans being made or the money being obtained from the Federal Treasury by any agency of Government which may come under their jurisdiction, regardless of which it may be. I think most of you will agree that this is rightfully so; because, after all, the Cabinet officers, out of their own confines of jurisdiction, the President within his, have the responsibility to the people of the country to know what the cost of any agency or any activity of Government may be. I believe if you will check the records and the reports that have been referred to here, and read these hearings—and we had voluminous hearings a year ago, or almost a year ago, and again shorter hearings this year on this subject—you will find there a rather plain story about this whole situation, something that you want to think about; and that, my friends, is that there was not one single word or one iota of testimony given or taken that the Secretary of Agriculture had ever at any time interfered in any way with the Director of REA in making these loans. Seemingly, the only thing the Secretary of Agriculture is guilty of is inquiring for information, getting information that will be of benefit to him and the President of the United States and which I hope will be of some benefit to the Congress of the United States, which, after all, has to pass upon the appropriations and the expenditures of public funds.

No; I took particular interest in it to inquire of every critical witness who came before our committee either last year or this year if they could point to a single instance, Mr. Chairman, where the Secretary of Agriculture had interfered in any way with the making of these loans. I heard the dialog that went on between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Indiana about an REA loan that was made or was not made down in southern Indiana. I am sorry the gentleman from Illinois has not had the opportunity to read the hearings. But I recall very distinctly that the testimony showed the request of the REA cooperative for one of the loans had been withdrawn and the loan was not being requested, had not been asked for, and it was not rejected or not turned down by either the REA Administrator or by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Now, what have we here? We have only the expressed fear on the part of somebody, somehow, that perhaps somebody in the distant future, some Secretary of Agriculture, or if it goes back to the Office of the President, if you transfer it there, some President might say that this loan is not justified and should not be made.

The facts are, and we ought to discuss facts when we consider legislation of this kind, that this Congress accepted without the opposition of those who now propose the legislation, the reorganization plan not only of 1939, as I mentioned a moment ago, but also Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953.

The facts are, whether you like it or not, if you will read this bill the language speaks for itself that it is now being proposed by the sponsors of the legislation that you amend both Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953. If as I understood the gentleman from Florida to say really all this trouble springs from the reorganization plan of 1953, I ask you in the name of common sense why was it necessary or advisable or wise to write legislation that would also amend the reorganization plan of 1939?

No; the facts are as I said a moment ago, someone has a fear that a future Secretary may overrule some loan.

The facts are, Mr. Chairman, that we now have more than 95 percent of the farms of this country being served with electricity, either from REA, and it is a glorious record that the REA has written in this field of activity, or by private power companies. The facts are that 75 percent or more of the loans that are now being made under REA are for the purpose of extending power facilities into urban and suburban areas for use not only by householders but for the use of industry.

The facts are, in my opinion, that sometime, someday, the Congress of the United States, which created this great agency, must take a look at it once more to see just what we should do in the future about this matter.

Now, it is my contention, it is my belief, in view of the facts, in view of the record, that there is not one single bit of testimony in these hearings that shows—and no witness could point to a single incident—where any damage has been done in any way to REA or where any loan has been rejected by the Administrator either with or without the review or the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture or any of his deputies. Consequently, I cannot understand for the life of me, having sat for weeks and weeks through these hearings last summer and again this spring, why this legislation is either necessary or wise. Why some Members of this House who marched up the hill, if you please, in 1939 and again in 1953 to give us a better administrative setup for our Government, a better control of the functions of Government, now want to turn around and march down the hill again and disintegrate and destroy, or at least maim and injure the very agency of Government that they created, the very methods that they said a short time ago were good and right and were proper, just does not make sense. There is no reason in the world that I know of that any member of any REA cooperative should have any fear that any of their proper activities will be interfered with in any way by this or, I believe, by any other administration; by this Secretary of Agriculture or by this President or by any other Secretary of Agriculture or any other President who may come from my party or from yours. So, I cannot support this bill, much as I believe in the purposes of the Rural Electrification Administration and much as I have supported that organization throughout the years and expect to continue to support it in all of its proper activities.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I want to thank the gentleman for his statement and ask him a question. I have read over this report and I do not believe I have ever seen a report from a committee of quite this nature, because the report itself takes up only about four pages plus, but then the bulk of this report seems to be a statement of Clyde T. Ellis, general manager of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association. He is not a Member of Congress. Was he a witness and was he interrogated?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. He was a witness before the committee back in 1958. He filed a statement.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Why would 11 or 12 pages of this report—and it is only a short report—be taken up with his statement? I have never seen a committee report of that nature.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The gentleman has asked me a question that I, of course, cannot answer, because I did not prepare nor did I sign the majority report. If the gentleman will turn the pages, he will find that I prepared and I filed the minority report, which starts on page 24.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. May I ask this further question. May we presume, then, that the majority is endorsing this statement of Mr. Ellis?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The gentleman will have to decide that for himself. I do know, of course, that Mr. Ellis is not a Member of Congress. He was a Member of Congress. Probably he is in a much more prosperous position and condition today than the average Member of Congress. I do know that he heads a great organization and is interested in legislation of this type. I do know that he has been a very vehement witness in his testimony, yet he did not point out a single instance or submit to the committee a single bit of direct evidence or even indirect evidence that in any way the Secretary of Agriculture had interfered with the Director of REA in making loans. And I want to emphasize for the record, the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, as well.

Mr. YOUNGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNGER. The gentleman is a member of the Hoover Commission. Is this bill in line with the Hoover Commission recommendations?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. This bill?

Mr. YOUNGER. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. No. Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1939 was sent up by President Roosevelt before the Hoover Commission became active. Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953, as well as the other, are both in line with the Hoover Commission recommendations that were made by the first Hoover Commission.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JONAS. Considering the fact that since its organization in 1935 and up to 1958 the U.S. Government has loaned $3.8 billion for this program, is there anything inherently wrong in having a Cabinet member supervise loans that are in excess of $1 million? It strikes me, since we already owe more money than all the nations of the world put together and we are facing a $12 or $14 billion deficit this year, it is high time that somebody began to supervise some of the lending agencies. Is there anything inherently wrong with this?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I get the import of the gentleman's question. I certainly do not feel so. As I stated a moment ago, I feel there is some responsibility on the part of the administration, and certainly of the Cabinet officers under whose jurisdiction these different agencies come, at least to obtain information and be able to furnish it to the Congress of the United States and to the American people.

Mr. JONAS. Am I correct in my understanding that the purpose of this legislation is to take away from the Secretary of Agriculture any authority to inspect, examine, supervise or give advice about the making of loans in excess of $1 million?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. That is a rather broad coverage but, as I read this bill, the Secretary of Agriculture would have no control, no right of review, no right of resurvey or study or right to comment on any loan that the Director of the REA might desire to make. He would be a free agent, on his own, absolutely.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. On page 126 of the hearings of 1958 I find this question asked of Mr. Ellis:

> Well, on page 2 you say there is a master plan to drain REA of its life and vitality?
>
> Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.
>
> Mr. HOFFMAN. You are referring to Mr. Benson; are you?
>
> Mr. ELLIS. I am referring to the master plan as outlined first by the——
>
> Mr. HOFFMAN. Are you referring to Mr. Benson?
>
> Mr. ELLIS. As being a party to it, yes.
>
> Mr. HOFFMAN. Who else is in it, briefly? Just the names and the positions they hold.
>
> Mr. ELLIS. The plan was outlined, the first time I saw it, by the task force on lending agencies of the Hoover Commission. Now the Hoover Commission did not adopt the task force recommendations but the task force made four recommendations.
>
> Mr. HOFFMAN. Just a minute. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take a lot of time. If you will just answer my questions, we will get through very quickly.
>
> I asked you who besides Benson participated in this master plan as you term it, to destroy REA?

I would like to have the Members notice this vile, wicked conspiracy here that Mr. Ellis seems to see somewhere. Here is his answer.

> Mr. ELLIS. The power companies.
> Mr. HOFFMAN. Well, name them.
> Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Eisenhower, President Eisenhower, Mr. Benson, Douglas McKay, and now I fear Secretary Seaton.

The gentleman says it is the power companies. I ask the gentleman from Ohio, did you ever hear of President Eisenhower being a power company before?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I never knew he was engaged in that activity. I thought, before he became President, he was a general. But I may have been misinformed.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I wish the gentleman would read this record again.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I shall check it very carefully. I heard that testimony, participated in it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Here is the question:

> Anyone else?
> Mr. ELLIS. Yes; the Director of the Bureau of the Budget.

He is in this vile conspiracy. Does the gentleman think Mr. Ellis must have been telling these folks about our plans?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I want to save some time for other gentlemen, if I may.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Let me go a little further. The gentleman had something to do with the Hoover Commission?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Slightly.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman was on the committee when it went through Congress.

> Mr. HOFFMAN. In fact, everyone who is opposed to your recommendations?
>
> Mr. ELLIS. Oh, no. I don't say that at all.
>
> Mr. HOFFMAN. You have gotten to the Director of the Budget, now. Who next?
>
> Mr. ELLIS. Everybody who has participated in trying to carry out the plan as outlined by this task force of the Hoover Commission on lending agencies, who has done any or several of these things to effectuate the plan as laid out there.

I cannot understand how my friend from Ohio would be in a deal of that kind.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I follow the gentleman's leadership on my committee, and he may have misled me at some time in the past.

Let me conclude that the administration that Mr. Ellis is speaking about was the same administration that furnished to the Rural Electrification Administration in funds more than 50 percent as much money in 6 years as did the preceding administrations in practically 18 years.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the sponsor of this legislation, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE].

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, this bill is designed to do two things. First, it reestablishes the loan-making authority of the Rural Electrification Administration Administrator. Second, it maintains in the Department of Agriculture for centralized administrative purposes the Rural Electrification Administration.

The Congress, when it passed the original REA Act in 1936, was explicit in its intent that this would be an independent agency with loan-making authority vested in the Administrator. This is typical of the action of the Congress in the establishment of all loan-making agencies within the Federal Government. If there is a superior authority placed over the REA Administrator in the loan-making power that he holds, it would be the only case in the Government where such control exists.

As the sponsor of the bill, I do not want to see the agency taken from the Department of Agriculture, where it has had good administration, where it is in a good home, and where in the Congress it comes within the jurisdiction of a committee, the Committee on Agriculture, which has always been good to the Rural Electrification Administration and has sponsored it and has made it a valuable agency for the rural segments of American society.

It has been testified that 95 percent of rural homes, of the farms of the country, have been electrified under this program, so no one questions the value of the Rural Electrification Administration.

I want to be perfectly honest about the argument that arises over whether the 1939 Reorganization Act gives the Secretary of Agriculture loan-making authority over the Administrator. Perhaps it did.

The point at issue here, however, is that there may be a question whether it does or does not. There is reason to believe that possibly it does. But, that is not an issue here because this authority was never exercised by the Secretary of Agriculture. It is significant, I think, that the first time it was exercised was in May of 1957, almost 4 years after the Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953, and it is significant that this change in the loanmaking operations of the agency came during the controversy over the Indiana case, which was explained sometime earlier in the afternoon by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DENTON].

It has been stated that no loans have been withheld. That may be perfectly true. But, the Indiana loan had not yet been made. There is evidence that many loans have been delayed. But, I am not arguing that point.

The Congress in 1936 set the REA up as an independent agency and the great stress in those days was that it would forever be free of politics. I think one way of keeping it free of politics is by vesting the loan authority in the Administrator. After all, what do we on this side of the aisle have to gain today by having it vested in the Administrator when he is appointed by the present administration? But, we think by making him an independent agent with full loan authority, he has a degree of independence that will permit him to keep his agency completely free of politics. That is our desire here.

It has been stated here by my good friend, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], that this legislation is born of fear. Well, perhaps, there is some degree of truth in that. But, that fear was generated at a time when there was cause for fear—at the time of the Indiana case. How do we know how many loans might have been involved, in the same manner as the Indiana case today had not this legislation been introduced last year to serve notice upon the Department that Congress was watching and that Congress had a voice in this matter.

It has been said that there was no opposition to the Reorganization Plan No. 2 in 1953. Well, there was opposition to it. Many distinguished Members of Congress were opposed to it, and if I could read the names without violating the rules of the House here this afternoon, I am sure some of the gentlemen of the House would be surprised to find who the opponents were to this plan. They insisted then and they still insist today that Congress would not have approved Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 if they had not had positive assurances that there would be no major change in the administration of the agency unless it was first cleared by the Congress.

I would consider that changing the rules as to the loanmaking authority is certainly a major change. Some of these Members of the Congress on both sides of the Capitol feel there has been a breach of the promises that were made in 1953. They feel that the assurances given to them at that time have not been fulfilled. You will read that in your committee report.

There is plenty of reason for the Congress to act in this matter, to preserve its prerogative, and to have something to say about this agency of Government. This legislation merely reaffirms the original statutory authority of the Rural Electrification Administration and reaffirms the intent of the Congress that the Administrator himself shall be the final authority in the granting of loans. What is so strange about that? He is the man who makes all of the arrangements. You know the REA Administrator is a pretty active man. He travels into every section of the country. He attends the regional meetings and the State and district meetings. He sits down with all the co-op leaders throughout the country and talks over with them their plans for future expansion and their plans for new cooperatives. I think we would be taking a great deal from him if he is not able to speak authoritatively to them, when they discuss with him the possibility of a loan to expand their operations.

There might be frequent occasions, unless we do something now, to keep this authority within the hands of the Administrator, when some assurance that he gives to these co-ops in keeping with what he believes to be within the regulations of his organization, should a superior be able to repudiate implied agreements with applicants. No one wants to take the agency out of the Department of Agriculture. We are very happy that it is there. We think it has prospered there. It prospered there long before we had the regulation of May 1957. This agency has lived a long time within the intent of Congress, and it is a very strange thing that suddenly this act is required to change the entire loan procedure. I think what we need to protect the REA is the enactment of this legislation to fulfill the intent of Congress.

There was much consideration given at the time of the enactment of the original act, to make certain that this would be one agency that would serve the rural segment of our society without regard to politics. I concede that the Indiana case, being the possible cause for this order, would bring in the element of politics. That would be only the beginning. There would be many more to follow that.

Let us keep this agency free from politics. Let the Administrator have final authority, as Congress originally intended that he have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE] has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCINTIRE].

Mr. MCINTIRE. Mr. Chairman, my interest in this legislation today stems from two sources: First, all the REA cooperatives in Maine are within my congressional district. I have followed their progress with a great deal of interest. I wish not only to commend the management of the cooperatives but also those who have considered their needs in new applications within the last few years, which applications have been approved and a fine job done. Second, my interest stems also from experience which I draw upon in the field of agricultural credit.

I am very much disturbed at what appears to be a challenge to the principle of review of loans on the part of those who have areas of responsibility in connection with those loans. I think it is an important principle. It is a basic part of the sound lending done by our agricultural lending agencies. The principle is that when loan applications reach a certain level they must be reviewed by those in higher authority.

This legislation, in my opinion, strikes at the very heart of that principle. In my experience with agricultural credit I have found the principle most sound. I shall oppose this legislation, because I think sound review is a very important part of constructive lending.

I subscribe to the principle that if there is invested in the authority of the Secretary a responsibility, then certainly administratively there should be room enough in the minds of us all that he should discharge that responsibility regardless of who the Secretary might be.

During my service in Congress I have worked objectively to keep lending functions of Federal agencies out of partisan politics.

I regret that there is nothing in the background of this legislation that brings me to any other conclusion than that it is inspired as a partisan attack on the present Secretary of Agriculture.

I regret that leadership in REA and in Congress stoops to these tactics. It is not the way I wish to handle REA affairs.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAMPLER].

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Chairman, I speak to you at this time on a subject which is very important to all of us. A great piece of legislation was enacted in 1935 which gave new life to the man who lives in the rural area; it gave him equality with those in other fields of endeavor; that was the establishment of the Rural Electrification Administration. From that came an appeal, an appeal to the private-power industry to create and generate electricity and carry it into these rural areas, but the appeal did not meet with the response that was necessary. There followed the formation of the rural electrification cooperatives. They have gone a long way in giving the farmer in the rural areas the power he needs. Now they have taken a further step in trying to meet those needs.

I speak for the State of Indiana, where we have found that the cost of electricity to the REMC's the Rural Electric Membership Corporations, was somewhat excessive. They had the idea they would like to broaden out a little to the point where they could generate their own electricity. Immediately the cooperatives appealed to the REA to get a loan of $42 million to activate a plan in the southern section of the State. The Governor of the State of Indiana brought his forces into action.

He rounded up three public utilities commissioners, indoctrinated them as he saw fit, sent them to Washington to confer with the President of the United States and with the Secretary of Agriculture and defeated the thing that Indiana was striving to procure, a plant to generate electricity in the southern section of that great State. There existed a rivalry between private industry and public industry, that was politically instigated to defeat a project designed to meet the needs of the public.

Yes; this could occur in your State. It did happen in mine.

We in Indiana have a unique situation but it is no different from a situation that might face you in your State. We are optimistic, progressive, and appreciative of the things that have happened in the past with the REA.

We also feel that the security and the defense of America must be built in this age where we face an epoch of power and an era of science and we feel we cannot be retrogressive and still build that program by 1965.

When you evaluate the situation you must go back to the farmers in your own districts. They are the ones who will express their views to you and they will cite the case in Indiana as the reference, whether the farmer hails from the Gulf of Mexico to the Great Lakes or from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There is a feeling that the State of Indiana has been discriminated against by placing REA loan responsibility in the hands of the Department of Agriculture without the jurisdiction of the Administrator of the REA; and, therefore, a most beneficial program cannot be maintained without such amendments as we are considering today.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAMPLER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Indiana as a new Member in making such an excellent speech and a fighting speech in behalf of the farmers of his district, State, and the country.

Mr. WAMPLER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOLLING, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 1321) to amend Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953, and come to no resolution thereon.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, last year we celebrated the 20th anniversary of one of the great pieces of humanitarian legislation enacted during New Deal days. The Fair Labor Standards Act has helped millions of people in the economy at the bottom of the economic ladder, who do not enjoy the protection of unions, to receive a minimum wage which helps them to receive at least subsistence income.

The Fair Labor Standards Act has also put a ceiling on hours, so that the 40-hour week has become a standard in the Nation. The Fair Labor Standards Act has made a great contribution to the economy. It has increased the purchasing power of the American people and in part made possible the great economic expansion which the Nation has enjoyed over the postwar years.

But we have been amiss in not taking full advantage of the possibilities of the law. During the 20 years while the law was in effect we have increased the minimum wage only twice and we have failed to extend the coverage under the law over these 20 years. Consequently, despite the years of successful operation under the Fair Labor Standards Act, we find that some 20 million employees working in commerce are still not covered by the provisions of the law.

We have been particularly amiss in not extending the benefits of the law to millions of employees who need the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act most. The law does not cover the 8 million employees in retail trade nor are the 4 million employees in services and related industries subject to the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I believe that the workers in these industries urgently need the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act and that we must extend the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act to these employees.

I do not favor Federal legislation to regulate wages in small local business. It would seem fair to me, therefore, that we exempt from the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act those retail and service establishments which are purely local in nature. But I cannot see the justice of failing to cover employees working in multi-million-dollar establishments and for chains which have hundreds and sometimes even thousands of outlets in practically every State of the Union.

A recent study by the U.S. Department of Labor shows that many of these multi-million-dollar retail and service corporations are the ones that are most guilty of paying substandard minimum wages. I believe that the protection of Fair Labor Standards Act should be extended to at least an additional 10 million workers throughout the country.

But not only is the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act entirely inadequate, the minimum wage in itself is outmoded. It is almost 4 years since Congress voted the dollar an hour minimum wage. I believe that it was inadequate then and it certainly is way behind the times today. The growth in American productivity also makes it possible to support higher minimum wages without hurting the economy.

As a matter of fact, it is a basic need of our economy to increase minimum wages which help boost the purchasing power of the broad masses of the population and support our ever-increasing capacity to produce. Boosting the minimum wage to $1.25, therefore, as provided by my bill, H.R. 312, serves not only humanitarian interests but is a basic need for a healthy and growing economy.

Mr. Sol Stetin, an able vice president and regional director of the Textile Workers Union of America, has kindly furnished me with an estimate of the impact on the economy of New Jersey if the minimum wage were raised to $1.25 per hour and coverage broadened. The survey was compiled by the research department of the AFL–CIO. An estimated 180,000 low paid workers in New Jersey would be affected. The required increase in total wage and salary payrolls in New Jersey would be less than one-half of 1 percent.

Although small as a proportion of total payroll, the increase would be considerable addition to the purchasing power of the State's lower-income families. In dollar terms, the increase in purchasing power for New Jersey's low-income workers would be an estimated $49 million a year.

As Mr. Stetin observes, these facts constitute a convincing and forceful argument for immediate adoption of the pending legislation.

This year we will celebrate the 21st anniversary of the Fair Labor Standards Act. This is the year when the Fair Labor Standards Act should reach full maturity. A proper way to celebrate it is to extend the coverage to workers in retail and service trades and to other millions of employees not covered by the act, and to boost minimum wages to $1.25.

DECLARING GOOD FRIDAY A LEGAL HOLIDAY

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, simple eloquence spoken from the heart is the most effective and meaningful method of communication. I am sure that none of us are able to forget the beautiful and touching letter written by Vanzetti, the humble fishpeddler, to his son on the eve of his death.

I am taking this opportunity to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter from one of my constituents. She is a woman who loves her country dearly and is deeply religious, not in the flashy, empty way of many but in the humble, honest way that is the mark of the true believer.

This woman, Mrs. Haase, has asked me to sponsor a bill making Good Friday a national legal holiday. I have checked with many religious and lay leaders who support such an idea because they feel, as I do, that Good Friday is as important in the life of the Christian religion as Christmas. I am introducing today a joint resolution declaring Good Friday in each year a legal holiday.

Herein follows the letter from Mrs. Haase. Its contents bear thoughtful consideration:

CLINTON, IOWA, April 7, 1959.

Mr. LEN WOLF,
Honorable Congressman,
House of Representatives, U.S. Congress,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WOLF: This letter is a request for your help to make Good Friday a legal national holiday.

Undersigned is a naturalized citizen having come from Germany. I embrace the Lutheran faith.

I dearly love this land and its Constitution. It is built on Christian principles. In fact we call ourselves a Christian nation preserving Christianity for the world.

This is a noble ambition and so I risk to ask my Government to make Good Friday a legal holiday. We have Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost. These three are our big Christian festivals. They fall on a Sunday and are automatic holidays.

As Christians we cannot have Easter without Good Friday. That is the most important day in our faith. America with all its blessings should take time to go with Christ to Golgatha, take full part in Christ's death. Give the people this day for consecration and really be prepared for the glory of Easter, after the darkness of Good Friday.

In Germany, it was a solemn day. Families partaking in the Lord's Supper and all work resting.

Here we are getting more aware of the holiness of the day. Many employers give their employees time off for church attendance. This is very nice—but I love to ask our Government for a proclamation to elevate Good Friday as a legal national holiday.

It would give our country a good standing in the world, as a Christian Nation, we are obligated to observe Good Friday in this measure. Surely there be many blessings for every citizen in this observation.

Mr. WOLF, I thank you for help you could give this plea. I am positive it has your personal approval, also of many other citizens.

May God bless you in your position in our Government.

Sincerely,

MARTHA A. HAASE.

TO REVISE, EXTEND, AND IMPROVE THE UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE PROGRAM

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, the speed with which H.R. 5640 passed in the House was not only motivated by the need for extending temporary unemployment compensation beyond April 1, when the emergency program was due to end. It was recognition of a continuing problem that could become chronic.

With the recession of last year behind us, insofar as production and profits are concerned, it was expected that this improvement would be reflected in a sizable reduction of unemployment totals.

The large number of people who are out of work is a matter of deep concern to the Congress. As our work force is steadily increasing on the one hand, while the introduction of automation is shrinking the number of job opportunities, we face a widening gap that must be closed, if we are to avoid the burden of heavy unemployment in this country.

A reduction in the standard workweek but without reduction in pay, in order to spread employment opportunities, may be the required solution. Meanwhile, improvements in our unemployment compensation system are necessary to provide support for the displaced workers in our economy. We understand management's need to concentrate on production and profits. The object is to produce more goods with fewer workers. Automation has come along fast in 1957 and 1958. This has resulted in rising business activity that does not absorb the unemployed.

It, therefore, becomes the public responsibility, through the cooperation of the Federal Government and the States, to provide compensation for the unemployed to a greater extent than before, in the hope and the expectation that our growing economy will open up more job opportunities.

This is our major national problem. Until such time as private enterprise, with an assist from Government, can generate a sufficient volume of activity to create jobs, we have no alternative but to extend and increase unemployment compensation.

We cannot maintain our leadership if we resign ourselves to a split-level society in which the large majority of our people enjoy high wages, high profits, and a high standard of living while 4 or 5 million adults are excluded from the opportunity to earn any income whatsoever.

The pressures and tensions inherent in this contradiction would seriously weaken our society because unemployment of this scope is both inhuman and wasteful.

The present hodgepodge of unemployment compensation systems in the various States, resembles structures that were built without design. They encourage divisive competition among the States and encourage the migration of industry with its disorganizing effect upon industries, workers, and communities.

The plain fact is that the Federal-State unemployment compensation system has not evolved with the times. It did not anticipate automation and its effects upon the labor force. It has not caught up with the realities of today. Restrictions in the laws kept a padlock on the $7 billion in unemployment reserve funds during the recession. Some groups of hired farm laborers, 1.8 million employees in small firms, and others, have no protection whatever under the present jobless aid laws.

One of the most serious defects is that dependent benefits are provided in only 11 of the States. The failure to make any distinction between the needs of the single person who is unemployed, and the unemployed family man who has many mouths to feed, is both shocking and tragic. There is no excuse whatsoever for this appalling neglect.

To achieve permanent Federal standards and supporting State legislation, it is necessary for the Congress to be guided by experience in the field which points to the following needs:

First, that coverage should be expanded.

Second, that the maximum duration of benefits should be increased to 39 weeks.

Third, that the maximum of benefits payable under the law shall be an amount equal to at least two-thirds of the average weekly wage earned by employees within the State, or an amount—exclusive of dependents' benefits—equal to one-half of such individuals average weekly wage, whichever is the lesser.

Fourth, That an equalization fund shall be established to reduce the excessive costs of jobless insurance in those States that are suffering from heavy unemployment because of national economic conditions.

Fifth, that the duration of benefits should be further extended in those States whenever the average unemployment within those States is in excess of 6 percent.

Much distress and bitterness have been caused by the overly strict and punitive requirements as to eligibility for benefits. Because an employee is partly at fault, is no valid reason why he and his dependents should be cut off completely from benefits.

It is advisable to moderate these requirements so that compensation may be denied in such State to any otherwise eligible individual only under the following circumstances:

For the first week of unemployment occurring within the benefit year.

For a period not in excess of 12 weeks immediately following the week in which he has been found, after an opportunity for a fair hearing, to have obtained, or to have sought to obtain, compensation by fraud, or willful misrepresentation of material fact.

For a period not in excess of 4 weeks immediately following the week in which he left suitable work without good cause, or refused to accept suitable work without good cause, or was discharged for misconduct in connection with his work.

Repeated renewals of the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act meet the problem on an emergency basis only. They are not concerned with the basic improvement of the program through the addition of Federal benefit standards.

In drawing your attention to my bill, H.R. 175, to provide for unemployment reinsurance grants to the States, to revise, extend, and improve the unemployment insurance program, and for other purposes, I want to emphasize the fact that the Federal unemployment compensation program, to succeed in its purpose, must be brought up to date.

FOREIGN CLAIMS SETTLEMENT COMMISSION

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives has often been called the greatest deliberative body in the world. Perhaps most Americans would agree with this appraisal but there are some who would not—and with good reason.

Among those who have cause to question the deliberative capacity of this body are the American soldiers who fought and bled in Korea, who were captured and brutally treated by the Communist enemy, only to return to this country to be branded traitors by an incompetent and dishonest governmental agency.

Mr. Speaker, Public Law 615 of the 83d Congress was enacted to compensate, in some small measure, our Korean prisoners of war for the shocking treatment they received at the hands of their Communist captors. In effect, the only condition for eligibility was that a POW could not knowingly and without duress have collaborated with the enemy.

The manner in which Public Law 615, 83d Congress, has been administered by the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission is a national disgrace. Members of the Commission and of the Commission staff have told me that they are thoroughly ashamed of the arbitrary and obnoxious procedures which not only have denied benefits to those eligible but have branded these applicants as traitors to their country to boot.

It may interest this deliberative body to know that, at least in one case, benefits were denied a claimant on the basis of collaboration with the enemy without the claimant being given even the semblance of a full and fair hearing. This case involves a former constituent of mine, Joseph Hammond, who is now a resident of Whittier, Calif. For those interested, his Foreign Claims Settlement Commission claim number is K–251435. Decorated for bravery and for severe gunshot wounds, Hammond received an honorable discharge from the Army upon his repatriation from a North Korean prisoner camp. But the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission, on the basis of secret and secondhand information which was never shown to Hammond, decided that he had sided with his Communist captors.

This story has been told many times, Mr. Speaker. I have repeated it here on the floor for the past 4 years with little more than a murmur of interest from the House committee which has the responsibility for reviewing the activities and affairs of the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission. The story has also been told in a nationally circulated magazine by a respected author who continues to be shocked and disillusioned by the callous indifference of the Claims Commission and the Congress to which it is responsible.

As I said before the Easter recess, Mr. Speaker, I plan to continue the airing of this grisly situation, however long it may take, until such time as the Congress acts to protect the dignity and rights of these men who fought so hard to safeguard freedom for all Americans.

BITUMINOUS COAL INDUSTRY

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, it is no secret that the bituminous coal industry has been in a relatively poor condition since the end of World War II. This is a basic and indispensable industry and one upon which we must depend for most of our energy requirements for the future. This would be particularly true in event of a third world war. Yet, production of bituminous coal last year was only around 400 million tons, a decline of 100 million tons below 1957. Coal's earnings are among the lowest of any major industry.

The coal industry is trying to help itself. Recently, the coal producers, the United Mine Workers of America, the coal carrying railroads, coal equipment manufacturers, and coal using electric utilities organized the National Coal Policy Conference, whose objectives are the advancement of the interests of coal. Action by an industry on such a broad front is, to my knowledge, without precedent and is most heartening.

The conference is sponsoring a dinner at the Statler Hotel on the evening of April 27 to which all Members of Congress have been invited. The theme of the dinner is the need for a national fuels policy.

I am hopeful that all Members of the House who can do so will attend this dinner. In making this statement, I realize the conditions under which Members work and the incessant demands upon their time. Yet, your presence would show your keen interest in the welfare of one of our major industries; it would be most appreciated by the leaders of the conference. Also, the welfare of the railroads is closely related to the welfare of bituminous coal, since coal is the biggest and most important single item which the rails carry. The decline in coal consumption during the past several years has hurt the railroads, and they are keenly interested in the volume of coal which is mined and consumed.

More important is the contention of the leaders of the coal industry that a national fuels policy should be drafted and put into effect without delay. They say we have a gas policy, an oil policy, an atom policy, but no policy which takes into account our fuel resources as a whole and their use to the best advantage of the country from the standpoint of national security and the national economic stability.

Among the speakers at the dinner on April 27 will be John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers; Howard E. Simpson, president of the B. & O. Railroad; Philip Sporn, president, American Electric Power Service Corp., of New York. George H. Love, chairman of the board of the Consolidation Coal Co., of Pittsburgh, and long a leader in coal, will preside. Mr. Love is chairman of the coal policy conference.

I am informed that the speeches will be brief and to the point. This, as I see it, is not just another dinner, but a meeting at which we can get the point of view of a major industry on a subject of major concern to all of us. I urge all of you who can to be there.

I think my colleagues in the House, should approve promptly the action taken in the Senate in setting up an emergency Commission on Unemployment.

This commission is of an emergency nature and contemplates finding facts on which to base emergency legislation to provide for relief in many areas of our Nation where chronic unemployment exists. The time allotted the commission, limited to 60 days, clearly indicates that no long-term program of permanent relief is planned.

This brings to the forefront the question of what Congress should do and must do to protect one of the Nation's major sources of fuel by setting up the necessary legislation to provide for extensive research into the possibility of finding new markets and new uses for our plentiful supply of bituminous coal.

Successful coal research would mean prosperity for West Virginia and other major coal producing States for the next hundred years. If adopted, it would be of more material good than any other program aimed at improving my State's economy.

Coal research has been and is presently under the control of the Bureau of Mines in the Interior Department. Despite the fact that this Department has up-to-date facilities, for research, worthwhile results have been limited. This brings to the forefront the question of whether an independent commission, for which the Government would provide separate appropriations, would be more effective and get more prompt results than to continue this program under the Interior Department, subject to the vicissitudes of politics and the ambitions of those who hope to gain political preference.

In order to hear an unbiased approach to what is the best policy to pursue, you can be assured that the banquet speakers at the Statler Hotel on the evening of April 27 will go into every angle of the problem of saving an industry essential to our prosperity and necessary to our national security.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to thank the distinguished gentleman for all he has done for the textile industry in the way of protection, and I should like to help his coal industry, also.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman.

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks I made regarding the Honorable Clare Boothe Luce's appointment to Brazil may be placed with the remarks I made concerning Pan-American Day.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY ACT

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ADDONIZIO] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, nearly 7 years have passed since our immigration and nationality laws were codified in the McCarran-Walter Act. I opposed that legislation when it was being considered by this House in April of 1952. I opposed it because I disagreed with the basic philosophies upon which it was founded.

In voicing my opposition to the bill at that time, I stated that "it is not always easy, in times such as these, for an honest man to cast his vote in this House with the comfortable certainty that time will prove that he made the right choice." I was confident then that my position was right. I am absolutely certain now that it was and that time has proven it so.

I have introduced legislation to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act in every Congress which has convened since it was enacted. This year I introduced H.R. 315—basically the same bill I introduced in the 84th and 85th Congress. I am proud to say that this is a companion bill to H.R. 16 introduced in this session by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, one of the most untiring champions in the cause of humanizing our immigration policies that I know. A number of other members have joined me in sponsoring the same bill since it was first introduced as the Celler-Lehman bill in 1955.

This bill would correct many of the injustices that exist in our present immigration system and would at the same time improve the system's administration. The most important change the bill would effect would be the elimination of the national origins quota system as the basis for determining whom among the peoples of the world we are to welcome as immigrants.

A plethora of words have been uttered in the past 35 years on the subject of our national origins quota system, by its advocates as well as its adversaries. I shall not add to this superabundance beyond stating that in my opinion the national origins quota system is a vestigial holdover of a discredited theory of racial superiority and inferiority. Many of us thought that we were fighting to rid the world of threats from a similar theory propounded by the Third Reich during World War II.

I would make only one other observation concerning our present quota system. This is that during these times, when we are striving to win over and hold in our camp the peoples of the uncommitted and underdeveloped areas of the world, this problem assumes larger proportions. For these are the very people we are slapping in the face with our national origins selections. It is the peoples of the young burgeoning nations, the newly emancipated countries, of Asia who bear the brunt of the most extreme discrimination in our present law—the Asia-Pacific triangle restrictions. We provide them not only with special restrictions but also with ancestral ones. Truly, it seems to me, we have singled out these people and said to them, "You are the most undesirable of mankind. Do not enter and corrupt our society." The time for a judicious reappraisal of this policy has long since passed.

In place of the national origins system, the bill I introduced would provide for a unified quota system which would promote the general welfare both internally and in our dealings with other nations. The mechanics of this new proposed system have been explained sufficiently before that I feel I need not discuss them at this time beyond outline form.

The bill provides for the distribution of quota immigrant visas without regard to race. If enacted it would be the first time since we first adopted a quota system that the distributions were so made.

Visas would be distributed according to a system of five preference classes of aliens, which include, first, family reunification class; second, occupational class; third, refugee class; fourth, national interest class; and, fifth, resettlement class. These terms are all self-explanatory, I think, except the national interest class, which includes peoples who would advance the national interests of the United States by strengthening areas of the free world that would be assisted in alleviating their own problems by the emigration of some of their people.

An unfair distribution of visas is guarded against by providing that no more than 15 percent of the visas available within any of the preference classes could go to any nation.

The total annual quota would be set permanently at 250,000. The percentage distribution of visas among the five preference groups would be made by the President each year, subject to the confirmation of Congress. In this way we would be assured of having an immigration policy which is current with existing conditions, so that visas would be issued to the various classes according to our domestic and foreign policy needs.

A number of bills other than those patterned after the Celler-Lehman proposal have been introduced in recent years to alleviate the rigors of the national origins quota system. These bills would provide for the pooling and redistribution of unused quotas. President Eisenhower has sent repeated messages to Congress advocating such a plan. If this were the best improvement that could be hoped for, I would support such a change. In essence, however, this would not correct the basic fallacy which eventually would have to be faced. If we are going to do anything at all we should remove the fallacy itself by doing away with the national origins principle.

There are a thousand other technical difficulties involved in eliminating all of the objectionable features of the Immigration and Nationality Act. There is the need for more adequate procedural safeguards in the granting or withholding of visas and in exclusion and deportation proceedings. There is the subject of judicial review. I do not intend to enter into a discussion of these many issues today. My purpose in speaking today is merely to draw the attention of this House to the fact that the need to improve our immigration policies is still with us—indeed it is more pressing than ever.

Most of the problems I mentioned have been carefully examined and provisions made for them in the bill I introduced. Many of the provisions of my bill are based upon the recommendations of the President's Commission on Immigration and Naturalization. This Commission, which was appointed by President Truman after the Immigration and Nationality Act was passed over his veto, made a thorough study of our immigration policies. It conducted extensive hearings throughout the country and heard scores of our most eminent leaders in the fields of religion, labor, and Government declare that those policies were outmoded and unjust. I would recommend as further reading to anyone interested in these basic issues the Commission's hearings and its report entitled "Whom We Shall Welcome."

When I think of the need to rid our immigration laws of the discriminatory racist provisions of the national origins quota system, I cannot help but think at the same time of a statement by Abraham Lincoln. I was reminded of this statement recently as it was quoted again by numerous speakers on the occasion of Lincoln's birthday. In the year 1855, Lincoln wrote to a friend:

> As a nation we began by declaring that "all men are created equal, except Negroes." When the know-nothings get control it will read "all men are created equal except Negroes and foreigners and Catholics."

When it comes to this, I shall prefer emigrating to some country where they make no pretense of loving liberty.

There is no excuse for not taking up the issue of immigration during this session of Congress. We must not delay any longer in putting the wheels of the legislative process into motion so that we may see done that which cries out to be done. I urge prompt action on this essential measure.

OIL IMPORT CONTROL PROGRAM

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say frankly to my colleagues that the complaints that have been made in Congress against the White House Oil Import Control Program are very disappointing to the people of West Virginia. From the time that I entered Congress 10 years ago, I have appealed for legislative protection against the foreign residual oil that has invaded the fuel markets of the east coast, displaced more than a quarter billion tons of bituminous coal in the interim, brought unemployment and poverty to coal and railroad communities throughout the Appalachian region, and made a mockery of competitive enterprise.

The President's order to place a lid on residual oil imports was taken as a security measure. The administration finally concluded that it is folly to depend upon an overseas source of oil supply at a time when the most vehement threats—complete with sound effects produced by the rattling of sabers—are being broadcast worldwide from Moscow and Peiping. Holding residual oil imports down to the level specified under the White House decree will protect at least a good portion of the coal production capacity that, in an emergency, would be required to substitute for the alien fuel now being consumed in east coast markets.

The West Virginia congressional delegation worked hard to convince the executive department of the need for a limitation of residual oil imports. We accept the White House order even though it is entirely inadequate from the standpoint of our State's economy. We have shown the need for enactment of a quota on residual oil imports. We shall continue to stand in support of this measure. Meanwhile, I challenge the statements of those isolated voices who have objected to the mandatory control program. I am convinced that insufficient thought has been given to the defense implications of the program, else no patriotic American would be willing to risk continuation of the policy that gave Open Sesame to international oil shippers at the expense of our vital domestic fuel industries. A study of our projected fuel requirements in a period of hostility will disclose ample reasons for the President's fear that further economic injury to the coal industry would constitute national danger.

I want to say to my friends who object to a holddown on residual oil imports that I resent your unsympathetic attitude toward American workers who have lost their jobs because some of your electric power stations and industrial plants have been able to buy energy a little cheaper from tankers hocking a foreign product at our east coast ports. If you would but review the pricing tactics of the important companies, I am quite certain you could not tolerate furtherance of the practice. In the 10-year period prior to 1959 residual fuel oil prices have varied from an annual average of $1.89 per barrel to an annual average of $3.08 per barrel, not in synchronization with general business fluctuations but geared only to undersell domestic fuels. We talk about competitive enterprise, and we enact laws to deter individuals and corporations from interfering with or destroying the spirit and operation of this system. There is no competition in a market where a commodity produced in a foreign country without a price tag is permitted to be unloaded in whatever quantity and at whatever price the international marketer decides upon.

Congress has heard these figures before, but I nevertheless want to reiterate a few facts that will explain what has happened to a large segment of the 4½ million unemployed American workers. When residual oil imports reached a level of 74 million barrels in 1949, a Senate committee, whose membership included the late Senators Neeley and Taft, set out to determine the actual economic effect of this alien product on U.S. jobs. The committee learned that the economic distress imported from the refineries of Aruba and Curacao not only affected miners in West Virginia, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and Ohio, but that it also extended to railroad workers, to suppliers, equipment manufacturers, and even to the banks and small business houses in all of these areas. Today those 74 million barrels have been more than doubled, aggravating the hardship and depriving hundreds of thousands of workers of an opportunity to earn a means of livelihood for themselves and their families.

At hearings on depressed areas by a Senate committee in Morgantown, W. Va,. last month, the managing director of the Morgantown Chamber of Commerce testified that Monongalia County suffered a 28-percent decline in coal production in 1958. Mr. James R. McCartney explained that this loss resulted in unempoyment for 2,000 coal miners, and he attributed excessive residual oil imports as the primary reason for the decrease in coal demand. It is interesting to note that Mr. McCartney also presented figures emphasizing the drastic losses suffered by the American glass industry as a consequence of the unfair competition originating in lands far away where wages are but a small percentage of those for identical work in this country. I mention this portion of Mr. McCartney's testimony because I think it should be in the RECORD. One of these days Congress is going to assume a more realistic approach to the unemployment problem in this country. Ultimately even the most vociferous free-traders will be forced to concur in a tariff program that will give the American manufacturer and worker at least a fighting chance at economic survival.

Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that our desire for a modicum of protection against excessive imports is not in any way intended to oppose a vigorous international trade program. We hope that labor forces in other parts of the world will eventually attain the standard of living to which every human being should aspire. If and when that objective is realized, free trade will be practical and certainly most desirable. Meanwhile, no country can logically be expected to admit vast quantities of products that are not needed and in fact tend to be destructive of the importing nation's economy.

We hope and pray for the continued improvement of living standards elsewhere in the world. We have contributed vast sums of money and materials to scores of nations in an effort to stimulate their economies. American capital has explored business opportunities in the far reaches of the globe; new industrial plants have thus emerged in the most backward areas to bring jobs and manufactured products within easy reach of the natives.

I was interested in the April 3 announcement that the southern Italy development fund is planning to borrow $30 million in U.S. dollars through the sale of Republic of Italy guaranteed external loan bonds. Of the total, $20 million will consist of 15-year sinking fund bonds to be offered publicly through Morgan Stanley & Co. Concurrent with the offering of the bonds, the World Bank and European Investment Bank are entering into loan agreements with the issuer, known as Cassa per il Mezzogiorno. These transactions are encouraging, Mr. Speaker. American investors appreciate an opportunity to participate voluntarily in oversea businesses. Such relationshsips have a tendency to bring us closer together and should without question accrue to the benefit of those financially interested in projects of this nature.

As U.S. investment dollars spur economic development in Italy and in other friendly foreign countries, industrial capacity will be expanded and more goods made available, not only in domestic trade, but also for export. Many of the products not now easily available in the United States will be purchased here. We welcome this prospect. Our only qualification is that a reasonable tariff and quota system be utilized to provide a mutually favorable balance. In the case of the residual oil that has inundated our markets, stockholders of the oil companies and the ruling regimes of producing and refining countries have been the prime beneficiaries.

I think you will agree that West Virginians are extremely fair in their attitude toward international trade policies. To ask us to endure prolonged periods of unemployment and depression merely to appease the selfish interests of a small group is eminently unfair. And, once again, I remind all of my colleagues that any program short of the provisions of the White House order would invite national catastrophe.

SELF-RULE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MORRIS of New Mexico. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, more than a month ago 21 Members of this House from both parties, of diverse political views and from diverse parts of the country, joined to sponsor legislation to restore the government of the District of Columbia to the people of the District. Four weeks ago we were told by the chairman of the District Committee that there would be hearings on this legislation in this session. But the chairman also said he sees no "urgency" in this matter. And the chairman of the subcommittee to which the bills were referred said he has made no plans for hearings. Two more weeks have passed and we have heard no more about these hearings.

This legislation has passed the other House four times in a decade, only to die because the District Committee failed to hold hearings. Under the circumstances, I think the lack of any sense of urgency or of any plans in the committee are difficult to understand. After 10 years of delay, I think there is some urgency and there should be some plans. It is a fact that a majority of the Members of this House want an opportunity to vote on this legislation. It is a fact that home rule is a part of the official platform of both parties, endorsed by the incumbent Republican President and by his Democratic predecessor. When given the opportunity, the people of the District have asked for home rule by large majorities. In the Democratic primary of 1956, nearly 80 percent of the voters favored it. In a Republican poll conducted by mail recently, I understand two-thirds were for it. Surely the District Committee deserves a chance to consider this legislation and this House deserves a chance to vote on it—and, above all, the people of the District deserve a chance to govern themselves.

But opponents argue that the Nation's Capital must have the close and careful supervision of Congress. Of course, home rule does not in any way challenge the supervision of Congress. It does take Congress out of the business of playing alderman. But has Congress done such a good job that we do not dare turn it over to the people? Look just at the recent record.

The District Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, conscientious and busy men with constituents and duties of their own to take care of, spent its valuable time in recent hearings on such important topics as leaks in the roof of the District morgue and the equipment of a new fireboat for the Fire Department. When the District appropriations bill came to the floor, a grand total of 28 out of 436 Members of this House were present to debate and vote on it. Is that the kind of close congressional supervision the District cannot do without? Congress should not have to spend its time checking on plumbing, the streetlights, and the fire equipment of the District. This House demonstrated, in the so-called debate on the District appropriations, that it does not want to and will not take its time for serious consideration of District matters—even those that are very important to the District, if not to Congress.

It seems to me demonstrably absurd, therefore, to argue that Congress must govern Washington because it is the Nation's Capital. Congress not only does not have to do so—it does not do so. It is overwhelmingly clear that Congress does not want to. And, if we are given a chance to vote on it, we will prove it by turning over municipal government to the people who are governed, who pay the taxes, and who do care enough to do the job.

The condition of the District is an eloquent demonstration of the kind of government it now has—and, if I may be pardoned for calling a spade a spade, it is carpetbag government—we are the carpetbaggers.

The chairman of the subcommittee who has not made any plans for hearings on home rule is, in spite of that, one of the most eloquent critics of the condition to which the District has come under congressional rule. No one could be more critical than he has been. And whether one agrees with his criticisms or not, there are plenty we can agree on. The District Commissioners, a few weeks ago, presented a report on the state of the District which is full of evidence that Washington is a city in trouble. Much of the same evidence was in an article in the Kiplinger Changing Times magazine last October. The downtown business area is making steady progress—downhill. While we founder in indecision and redtape about slum clearance, the slums keep on growing. City services deteriorate, the schools are starved for adequate funds, and as a result, people who can afford it move to the suburbs. People who cannot afford to move stay here. And the tax resources of the city shrink accordingly.

This is a vicious circle. There is no easy way out of it for Washington, any more than for any other city with acute urban problems. But we, the Congress, who supposedly must run the municipal affairs of the Capital because its citizens cannot be trusted to do so—we have certainly not found a solution. Why then, should we not give the people themselves a chance? They live here, not us. If Washington is to be a Capital to be proud of, there must be a change—there must be a vigorous local government, endowed with the authority of local election and the solicitude of local residents. These people care, because this is their home. We haven't done the job; why not let them try?

It is hard to see an argument against home rule. Are we really afraid, in the Capital of American democracy, to try such a dangerous experiment as a little local democracy? Our Capital is not only physically an increasingly shabby example for our Nation. Morally, it is an even worse example. Washington, our National Capital, is the one city, in this democratic country, where we repudiate democracy.

The legislation before this House is not dangerous or radical legislation. It simply proposes to restore the local self-government that is the oldest tradition of the Nation's Capital—a tradition that obtained from the earliest days for three-quarters of a century and which was taken away by Congress in the 1870's. At the same time, it amply safeguards the Federal interest. Not only does it provide for a congressional veto over municipal action; it provides also for a Presidential veto; and on top of that, it provides for an appointed, not an elected, mayor. If we are really afraid to grant so modest a taste of democracy to the people of Washington, we must indeed be deathly afraid of democracy. Is that a verdict we want to accept?

I do not. I want to let the people of Washington run their own business. I believe most of the Members of Congress who obviously aren't doing their job as aldermen would like to turn the job over to the people of Washington, who can and will do it.

To do so, in view of the facts, is a piece of elementary common sense. It is also an act of justice and fair play to the people of the District. And I think it is very plain what the people of this country, our constituents, want us to do. The press all over the country is increasingly commenting, and critically, on our failure to act. I would like to insert, at the end of my remarks, a summary which appeared in the Washington Post and Times Herald, of 21 editorials, from 16 States, as evidence of national sentiment for restoring democracy to the District of Columbia. In doing so, let me add that I believe the preponderant sense of this House is that there is an urgency about this matter, that we have delayed far too long, and that this year we will act to return to the people of Washington at least this limited right to govern themselves.

[From the Washington Post and Times Herald, Mar. 25, 1959]

PRESS IN 16 STATES CALLS FOR HOME RULE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

A total of 21 newspapers in 16 States have urged home rule for the District in recent editorials.

Urging Colorado Congressmen to fight for home rule here, the Denver Post said: "The undemocratic situation in the National Capital is a reproach to our whole political system, and all of us have a stake in correcting it."

Other newspapers cited the District as being a flagrant example of taxation without representation and the denial of government by consent, according to editorial excerpts released yesterday by the Washington Home Rule Committee, Inc., 924 14th St. NW.

Editorial excerpts on the home rule issue follow:

Honolulu Advertiser: "The District of Columbia ought to have the right to vote. When those folks talk about second-class citizenship, it should fall on sympathetic ears and stir sympathetic hearts in these parts. They don't have a delegate to Congress, not even a voteless one. They don't have a Governor, not even an appointed one. They don't have a legislature, not even a Territorial one. They pay taxes without representation."

Glens Falls (N.Y.) Post Star: "We wonder if Congress will be able to drag its eyes from the far horizons this year long enough to see the example of homerulelessness at its very feet. We mean Washington, D.C. There's an old saying that he who dances must pay the piper. Washington taxpayers pay the piper. They just don't get a chance to dance."

San Francisco Chronicle: "The approval of the District Committee in the House is needed, and we earnestly urge that it be given.

"The rest of the country well knows that home rule has been denied to Washington, D.C., all these years because past Congresses insisted on fighting the Civil War again there. But the conscience of the country cannot permit this travesty of democracy in the center of world leadership of democracy."

Hartford Courant: "The voteless status of the inhabitants of the Nation's Capital has long been one of the anomalies of our system. Self-government is assumed to be the right of every organized community in the Nation, yet at the heart of National Government there exists a city lacking this fundamental right. Citizens rightfully claim that it is taxation without representation."

New York Herald Tribune: "Naturally, the 850,000 dwellers in the District—one hesitates to call them citizens, though of course they are—are hoping that the entry of the new States will give some impetus to their own petition for better treatment.

"Why does Congress cling to this ridiculous system? The answer is that a small group of Southerners in the District Committee of the House of Representatives, wishing to keep matters of racial policy in their own hands rather than turning them over to the local inhabitants, has persistently bottled up the necessary legislation."

Christian Science Monitor: "Major resistance to home rule for Washington has stemmed from the fact that a large part of the city's potential electorate is colored. In fact, with growth of residential suburbs in Maryland and Virginia, recent surveys indicate that Negroes form over half the population of the Federal District. Yet few would seriously advocate that Harlem in New York City or the South Side of Chicago should be disfranchised."

Denver Post: "Since the people of Washington have no representatives of their own in Congress, they are dependent on the rest of us for help in getting their bill to a stage where it can be voted upon.

"The undemocratic situation in the National Capital is a reproach to our whole political system, and all of us have a stake in correcting it.

"We hope Members of Congress from Colorado will do whatever they can to aid in the fight to get this bill out of committee so it can pass."

St. Louis Post-Dispatch: "Surely the American people do not send representatives to the Senate and the House to do the chores of aldermen. This nonsense would be ended by a bill which would relieve Congress of these District affairs just as it has been relieved of such responsibilities in the Territories. A referendum would be held, giving the people of the District a chance to accept home rule in the form of a Territorial government. If they did, an economical and efficient local government would be set up under an appointed Governor and an elected 15-member Assembly. Certain functions which properly are the Government's would be excluded from the Assembly's authority. This represents a compromise hardly to be avoided, but it would not keep the people of the District from managing those affairs which are truly their own."

Oregonian, Portland, Oreg.: "The absurd position of Washington, D.C., as the undemocratic capital of the world's largest democracy, is underscored by the fact that the 'mayor' of the capital city is a Nevadan whose interests and constituency are thousands of miles away."

Minneapolis Tribune: "The proposed legislation still would not be full enfranchisement of the people of the District. But it would finally give more than 850,000 Americans the right to rule themselves in local matters. It would provide a more efficient government for the city. It would relieve Congress of the task of handling the details of District affairs. It would be a logical followup to Congress' action in voting statehood to Alaska and Hawaii."

Farmington (N. Mex.) Daily Times: "Now that action on Hawaii is completed, perhaps Congress can find time during its present session to do something about the plight of another group of Americans who, in a sense, are citizens in name only.

"The frustrated citizens of Washington have our complete sympathy. Aside from the principle involved, it seems slightly ridiculous for Congressmen to be spending their time worrying about Washington fire, police, sewage and street problems, etc., when other far more critical issues of national import await decision.

"If support from this corner will do the Home Rule Committee any good, the committee has it."

St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times: "Quite apart from the paradoxical injustice of nearly a million American citizens living right in the seat of the world's greatest democracy without a scintilla of self-government, there's another good reason why the rest of us should demand that Congress put an end to this 75-year-old situation.

"That is to get rid of the piddling city council functions which Congress must discharge as long as it refuses to give the District self-government."

St. Paul Pioneer Press: "Minnesotans last year strongly endorsed the principle of home rule by adopting a constitutional amendment permitting towns, cities and counties greater control over local affairs.

"In view of this approval, it would seem that the great majority of Minnesotans, if not all, would support extending that principle to the residents of Washington, D.C. The 850,000 persons who live in the District of Columbia now have no voting privileges and no voice in the conduct of their city's affairs."

McClatchy Newspapers of California: "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. This basic principle of American Democracy was set forth first in the Declaration of Independence.

"But where is one of the most flagrant violations of this principle to be found? In Moscow? In Peiping? In Warsaw?

"Unhappily it is right in the Capital of the United States whose permanent residents have been voteless for the past 79 years."

Milwaukee Journal: "The bill died in the House. But it is being offered again. It deserves passage. It is not a perfect plan, but it is the best that Congress is apt to accept. Washington has home rule coming. It has a right to run its own local affairs. Congress needs to get rid of the burden of running a local government."

Oil City (Pa.) Derrick: "A bill to grant home rule to the people of Washington is pending in the Congress. It should be approved without delay."

Springfield (Mo.) Leader and Press: "Washington is unique among American cities, most cities in the world, for that matter. It is not self-governing, but is governed by the U.S. Congress. Think about that a moment. America has been quick to reenfranchise even its conquered enemies once they were defeated—the Germans and the Japanese, to give the two most recent examples. But we deny the people of our Capital City the ballot."

Tacoma (Wash.) News Tribune: "It would be grossly unfair to deny 850,000 people the right to vote and to run their own local institutions. Residents of Washington State can do their fellow Americans in Washington City a friendly act by urging the support of their own delegation to passage of the pending necessary legislation."

Daily Pantograph, Bloomington, Ill.: "Whatever the national emergency, be it the Berlin crisis or sending troops to Lebanon, 31 Members of the House and Senate who constitute the District "city council," must take time to deal with the purely local issues of a big city. They were not elected by the people of the District, and they are not responsible to these people.

"This inefficient and undemocratic practice should be ended by granting to the people of the District of Columbia the home rule they seek and deserve.

"None of us is entirely free as long as Congress denies freedom to people of an entire area in which the National Capital is located."

Olean (N.Y.) Times Herald: "We are glad to pass this along to our readers, because we feel that there should not be a disenfranchised segment of the American population with no control over how their local tax money is spent.

"Secondly, and of importance to all of us, none of our Representatives in Congress should be burdened with the task of acting as members of the District of Columbia city council. There are too many items of national importance requiring their attention."

Burlington (Iowa) Hawk-Eye Gazette: "But Congress has little stomach, or time, for the job.

"Senator JOSEPH CLARK, a former Philadelphia mayor, for example, has announced he will no longer serve on the Washington, D.C., committee.

"Senator STEPHEN YOUNG, a newcomer from Ohio, declared: 'The people of Ohio did not elect me to be county commissioner for the District of Columbia.'

"Well, we gave statehood to Alaska, and likely will bestow it also on Hawaii. Isn't it time to give cityhood to Washington?"

MEMORIALS OF THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF OREGON

Mr. MORRIS of New Mexico. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentlewoman from Oregon [Mrs. GREEN] may extend her remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to lay before the House four memorials enacted by the 50th Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, currently in session. I ask that these memorials be printed in full following my remarks in the RECORD.

Senate Joint Memorial 3, adopted on March 13, 1959, calls for the appropriation of adequate sums for the construction of forest access roads, and for the modernization and expansion of recreational facilities in our national forests.

House Joint Memorial 2, adopted on March 16, expresses the opinion of the legislature of my State on the recurring question of Federal aid to education. That memorial pierces to the heart of the ideological camouflage which opponents of aid to education have laboriously constructed and points out that the Federal Government has a rightful obligation to the preservation of our American way of life by assisting the cause of education. I am proud that my State has taken this forward-looking position.

House Joint Memorial 4, adopted on March 17, calls upon the Congress to carry out the clear intent of Public Law 627 of the 84th Congress, to enable the existing toll-free bridge across the Columbia River between Portland, Oreg., and Vancouver, Wash., to remain toll free.

House Joint Memorial 5, enacted on March 19, calls for the President to review the possibility of additional funds for the orderly planning of further development of our great river resources, with a particular view toward expediting a solution of the fish passage problem. This particular problem is one which has held up several long-range decisions as to the best method of developing the resources of the Columbia Basin, not for the residents of the region alone, but for all the people of the Nation. Such additional funds, I sincerely believe, would be a very wise and economical investment in the future. I intend to bring the views of the Oregon Legislature and of interested Oregonians to the attention of the appropriate committees at the proper time.

I would also like to take this opportunity to express my belief that the 50th Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, as it begins the second century of the history of a great State, is making a great record in exemplification of Oregon's reputation as a forward-looking, bold, and imaginative frontier.

HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL 2

To His Excellency, the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, and to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, and to the Oregon Members of these legislative bodies:

We, your memorialists, the 50th Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent as follows:

Whereas increasing school costs are imposing a steadily increasing burden upon the taxpayers of the State of Oregon; and

Whereas the present tax collection policies of the Federal Government fall heavily upon State and local sources, with little corresponding return to the State for the assistance of public school education; and

Whereas under such taxation policies the Federal Government should assume its rightful obligation to the preservation of our American way of life by assisting the cause of education; and

Whereas the Soviet Government poses a real and terrible threat to the leadership and existence of the free world through its accomplishments in the field of science; and

Whereas added financial resources will be needed by our States and local communities to enable them to maintain an educational program not only to compete with the Soviet Government in the field of science, but also to explore and solve the basic problems of living and leading in a world teetering on the brink of atomic catastrophe; and

Whereas the Federal Government has vastly superior taxing powers, and it is the announced policy of both major political parties that the Federal Government should contribute moneys to the support of local elementary and secondary education: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State Oregon (the Senate jointly concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States is hereby urged to provide and pass legislation giving grants to the various States on the basis of each State's school-age population, providing funds for the use of the States for the assistance of elementary and secondary public school education; be it further

Resolved, That the Oregon Members of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives promote and support such legislation; be it further

Resolved, That His Excellency, the President of the United States, is hereby urged that he give such legislation his full support and leadership, and that he use the full influence and resources of his great office to insure the passage of this legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the house of representatives be and hereby is directed to send a copy of this memorial to the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, to the President and Chief Clerk of the U.S. Senate, to the Speaker and the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to all members of the Oregon congressional delegation in the Congress of the United States.

Adopted by house February 16, 1959.
Readopted by house March 16, 1959.

RUTH E. RENFROE,
Chief Clerk of House.
ROBERT D. DUNCAN,
Speaker of House.

Adopted by senate March 12, 1959.

WALTER J. PEARSON,
President of Senate.

SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL 3

To His Excellency, the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, and to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress Assembled:

We, your memorialists, the 50th Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent as follows:

Whereas the economy of the State of Oregon is largely based on timber and recreation; and

Whereas the national forests of the United States contain the key timber supply and recreational resources within the State of Oregon; and

Whereas the economy and welfare of the State of Oregon are therefore dependent upon the quality of the management of the national forests; and

Whereas sound management of the national forests requires adequate financing; and

Whereas at hearings conducted by the Subcommittee on Public Roads of the Committee on Public Works of the U.S. Senate in December 1957, in Oregon, and at other points throughout the Western States, Members of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives, authorized officers of the U.S. Forest Service, representatives of State and local governments and knowledgeable citizens of the Western States unanimously agreed that proper management of the national forests for the most effective and efficient development of their recreational and timber resources requires the accelerated development of a permanent access road system within such national forests; and

Whereas the budget presented by the executive branch of Congress for its consideration requires appropriations for this purpose that are substantially below the sum that only 1 year ago Congress authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1959; and

Whereas the said budget requires an appropriation of only $8,500,000 to finance Operation Outdoors, the 5-year plan announced by the U.S. Department of Agriculture for modernizing and expanding recreational facilities in the national forests to meet the heavily increasing use made of the national forests by our citizens for recreation; and

Whereas such plans for successful completion of Operation Outdoors specifically contemplated that an appropriation of $19,500,000 would be required for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1959: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the House of Representatives jointly concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States is hereby urged to appropriate for the construction of access roads in the national forest during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1959, the full amount of $30 million that is authorized therefor by law; be it further

Resolved, That the Congress appropriate for Operation Outdoors the full amount of $19,500,000 previously agreed upon as a necessary expenditure during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1959; be it further

Resolved, That the Oregon Members of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives be asked to promote and support such appropriations; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States; to the President and the Chief Clerk of the U.S. Senate; to the Speaker and the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States; and to all members of the Oregon congressional delegation.

Adopted by senate March 10, 1959.

MEDA COLE,
Chief Clerk of Senate.
WALTER J. PEARSON,
President of Senate.

Adopted by house March 13, 1959.

ROBERT B. DUNCAN,
Speaker of House.

HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL 4

To His Excellency, the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, and to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the 50th Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent as follows:

Whereas U.S. Highway 99 crosses Washington, Oregon, and California extending from Canada to Mexico as a truly interstate, interregional and international highway; and

Whereas U.S. Highway 99 has been designated as an integral portion of the new "National System of Interstate and Defense Highways," commonly known as the Interstate Highway System; and

Whereas there is now no toll road, toll bridge or other toll charge anywhere along this important throughway; and

Whereas the brunt of the toll charges at the Portland-Vancouver interstate bridge would fall on workers who must daily commute to their jobs; and

Whereas section 109 of the Federal Highway and Highway Revenue Acts of 1956 (Public Law 627, approved June 29, 1956) provides in part as follows:

"It is hereby declared to be the intent and policy of the Congress to equitably reimburse those States for any portion of a highway which is on the Interstate System, whether toll or free, the construction of which has been completed subsequent to August 2, 1947, or which is either in actual use or under construction by contract, for completion, awarded not later than June 30, 1957 and such highway meets the standards required by this title for the Interstate System. * * * It is also declared to be the policy and intent of the Congress to provide funds necessary to make such reimbursements to the States as may be determined": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the Senate jointly concurring therein), That the President of the United States recommend, and the Congress of the United States enact, legislation clarifying the provisions of the Federal Highway and Highway Revenue Acts of 1956 for the purpose of having that portion of the Interstate Highway System known as the Portland-VanCouver Interstate Bridge continued to be operated as a toll-free bridge, and that the costs of improving navigation on the Columbia River and improving the existing highway be borne and paid for out of funds provided by the Congress from gas taxes and other revenues for the Interstate Highway System, and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States, Secretary of the U.S. Senate, Clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives, and to each member of the Oregon Congressional Delegation.

Adopted by house February 25, 1959. Readopted by house March 17, 1959.

Chief Clerk of House.
ROBERT B. DUNCAN,
Speaker of House.

Adopted by senate March 13, 1959.

President of Senate.

HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL 5

To His Excellency, the Honorable PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

We, your memorialists, the 50th Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent as follows:

Whereas there is growing need in the Pacific Northwest for answers to the critical problems surrounding the passage of anadromous fish, particularly salmon and steelhead, at hydroelectric dams; and

Whereas failure to adequately finance fishery research is causing delay in the planning of dams which will be needed within a few years in the interest of national defense and economic expansion: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the Senate jointly concurring therein), That we urge the President of the United States to review the situation with the hope that additional Federal appropriations may be made available through the Department of Defense or the Department of the Interior so that planning for both fish and dams may proceed in an orderly fashion; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States, all Members of the Oregon congressional delegation, and the legislative assemblies of the States of Washington, California, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Nevada, and Wyoming.

Adopted by house March 19, 1959.

Chief Clerk of House.

Speaker of House.

IS THERE INEQUITY INVOLVING PENSION RIGHTS OF THE WIDOWS OF JAPANESE PRISONERS IN WORLD WAR II?

Mr. MORRIS of New Mexico. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEVERING] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, I have recently received a most interesting letter from Dr. H. W. Glattly, of the Prosthetics Research Board, National Academy of Sciences, National Research Council, in Washington, relating to possible inequities involving the pension rights of the widows of veterans of World War II who were prisoners of the Japanese during that great conflict.

As a prisoner of war, although as a civilian volunteer, I spent 3½ years in Japanese military prison camps, Mr. Speaker, and I know that the dietary needs of the natives of the Far East are very different from those of a native of North America. I was on the burial detail on many occasions in Camp O'Donnell and at Cabanatuan, and I can testify to the fact that hundreds of our fighting men died of sheer starvation, and that thousands of them returned to their homes with disabilities suffered from protracted hunger—and from which they will never completely recover. As Dr. Glattly points out, the death rate of those Westerners subjected to the Far East minimal diet for long periods of time has been unusually high, compared with the death rate of prisoners who were interned in German prison camps. The letter has a great deal of information which I commend to my colleagues, particularly those who serve on the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

The letter is as follows:

PROSTHETICS RESEARCH BOARD,
NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES,
NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL,
Washington, D.C., April 1, 1959.

Hon. ROBERT W. LEVERING,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. LEVERING: Under present laws governing the Veterans' Administration, service connection with respect to the cause of death of a veteran is normally dependent upon documentation in official medical records of a related condition or disability that occurred during the individual's period of military service. There are certain disabilities for which service connection has been established by statute based upon "presumption." This is true of tuberculosis. In such instances, the condition must be made a matter of record within a specified number of years after a veteran leaves the military service.

In the past few years there have been many instances wherein a former prisoner of war of the Japanese has died of disease, but since a related condition was not a matter of record at the time of the individual's separation from the service, service connection could not be established under existing laws and the widow had no pension rights. This occurred recently in the case of Maj. Gen. E. P. King who commanded the U.S. forces in Bataan. Although General King had served this Nation for 35 years at the time he retired and had undergone the stresses and strains of a surrender and 3½ years of starvation as a prisoner of war, his widow's claim for pension was denied on the basis that his death by a heart attack was not service connected since a cardiac condition was not a matter of record during his period of military service. Many similar cases have been brought to my attention since 1945.

The following facts are relevant to this problem:

1. No sizable U.S. force in World War II suffered the catastrophic casualty rate of the units that defended the Philippine Islands and were captured by the Japanese.

2. No large group of American prisoners of war in any other theater of World War II were subjected for so long a period of time to a diet that was so grossly inadequate both quantitatively and qualitatively and to the almost total absence of medical care such as were those comprising the Philippine force who were prisoners of war of the Japanese for about three and a half years.

Germany recognized the provisions of the Geneva convention as regards the treatment of POWs. Japan did not recognize this international agreement. There was, accordingly, a wide disparity between the policies of these two powers governing the treatment of prisoners of war. This was reflected in an infinitely higher mortality and disability rate in Japanese camps as compared with those operated by the Germans and other Axis nations. The following data was taken from "A Follow-Up Study of World War II Prisoners of War" that was prepared for the Veterans' Administration by the National Academy of Sciences—National Research Council:

	Captured	Recovered	Died as POW's	Death rate
				Percent
European theater	93,653	92,820	576	0.6
Pacific theater	24,992	16,358	8,452	33.8

The death rate was 55 times higher in Japanese camps than in those operated by the Germans and Italians. There was a correspondingly higher rate of disease among POW's of the Japanese.

3. Medical literature does not contain today any comprehensive study of the long-range effects of severe starvation endured for a long period of time.

The above-mentioned study made by the National Academy of Sciences for the Veterans' Administration makes this statement on page 15:

"The adverse conditions in Japanese prison camps responsible for a mortality excess of such magnitude can be assumed to have had strong selective effects. A question of special interest is whether those who survived such conditions, presumably by virtue of exceptional viability, nevertheless bear lasting residuals of the experience severe enough to affect their survival unfavorably in the long run."

4. During the 6-year period 1946–51 (p. 19 of the study cited above) there was a mortality rate of 31.7 percent among the surviving Japanese POWs as compared with an expected actuarial rate of 14.2 percent. The European exprisoners experienced no excess of mortality during this 6-year period (p. 25 of the NAS study).

The NAS report, on page 63, concludes that "The Pacific prisoners who survived imprisonment were, without question, adversely affected by that experience, whereas the European prisoners showed no measurable effect of their imprisonment, at least during the first 6 years after liberation. The negative findings in the European group appear to be sufficiently well established to conclude that more intensive study of this group, for the period thus far observed, is not indicated.

"For the Pacific prisoners the evidence is unequivocal that the effects of imprisonment resulted in a markedly reduced survival potential at liberation."

5. In view of the findings of this report, it would be desirable to request the Veterans' Administration to bring up to date the mortality data regarding the ex-prisoners of the Japanese.

6. Relief for this problem must of necessity be by statute. Since the direct relationship of starvation to many diseases cannot be documented in medical literature, the principle of presumption must be utilized. The use of this principle in the determination of service connection is quite common. Before the present Congress are the following measures involving service connection for veterans based upon presumption: H.R. 279, H.R. 281, and H.R. 280.

7. The number of potential beneficiaries of relief legislation for this group is relatively small, and the act would therefore not be significant as regards the budget. Excluded from the provisions of such an act would be deaths due to accident.

I have not as yet heard from Dr. Bloom with respect to holding a meeting on this subject at the time of the annual meeting of the American Defenders of Bataan and Corregidor next month. If you believe that this project is feasible, a plan to initiate it should be developed.

Sincerely,

H. W. GLATTLY, M.D.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Radiation Hazard Act of 1959

OF

HON. KENNETH A. ROBERTS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 14, 1959

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, on April 10, 1959, I introduced a bill, H.R. 6265, to provide for the vesting of primary responsibility for the protection of the public health and safety from radiation hazards in the Public Health Service of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and for other purposes.

I believe that this bill deals with a most important and crucial public health hazard, the danger of ionizing radiation. The principal sources of ionizing radiation which have been created or developed by man include X-ray machines, nuclear reactors and their radioisotopic byproducts, high-energy particle accelerators, a number of concentrated forms of naturally occurring radioactive materials, and the fallout constituents of nuclear weapons. Among these sources, only nuclear reactors, their fuels, their radioisotopic byproducts, and their radioactive wastes have been placed under substantial regulation from the standpoint of their influence on health and safety.

In the absence of a comprehensive program through which the health hazards of all sources of ionizing radiation may be brought under supervision, there is an important weakness in the Nation's efforts to control radiation safely.

X-ray machines are now used extensively in industry as well as in the health professions. Radioisotopes are finding application in a rapidly increasing number of industrial plants, university laboratories, hospitals, and agricultural research centers. And nuclear reactors are being planned and constructed at an accelerating pace. Few areas of human activity remain where sources of ionizing radiation do not find some practical application.

A comprehensive program for the control of radiation hazards includes many elements; two are particularly worthy of attention: (a) The formulation of sound radiation protection standards and (b) the enforcement of public health regulations based upon these standards.

One of the important problems with which the Congress must deal is the extent to which the regulatory and enforcement functions of a radiation control program must be discharged by the Federal Government and to what extent they may be discharged effectively by State and governmental agencies.

Briefly stated, the bill H.R. 6265 would do the following. It declares it to be the policy of this Government that primary responsibility for the protection of the public health from radiation hazards shall be vested in the Public Health Service and in State and local health authorities. It instructs the Surgeon General to develop, in consultation with Federal, State, and local agencies exercising responsibilities in connection with the control of radiation hazards, uniform standards of radiation protection. It authorizes the Surgeon General to conduct research, studies, investigations, and training programs with respect to the control of radiation hazards both directly and through grants-in-aid. It establishes a National Advisory Council on Radiation Hazard Control, to be appointed by the President and to consist of 15 members, including the Surgeon General of the U.S. Public Health Service, the Secretary of Defense, the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, and the Director of the National Science Foundation. And finally, it requires the Surgeon General to submit to the Congress not later than February 28, 1960, a comprehensive program for the control of radiation hazards emanating from all manmade sources. This program will be developed by the Surgeon General after consultation with Federal, State, and local agencies exercising responsibilities in connection with the control of radiation hazards.

Mr. Speaker, the bill H.R. 6265 was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and it is my hope as chairman of its Subcommittee on Health and Safety that action on this important legislation can still be taken during the first session of this Congress.

Mr. Summerfield's Space Age Philosophy

OF
HON. DON MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 14, 1959

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, time was when it took 4 days for regular mail to reach me here from the State of Washington. For 6 years, as a matter of fact, I learned that I could count on this as an immutable rule of thumb.

It was kind of comforting, even, to know I could depend on this, one of the few unchanging constants in an age of bewildering flux.

Alas, no more. Mr. Summerfield, caught up with the spirit of the times, could not leave well enough alone. He persuaded the President and a somewhat reluctant Congress to give him more money through increased postal rates to finance a wholesale modernization program of the postal service. He promised us a new, efficient postal system, in keeping with the moods and needs of the mid-twentieth century.

The new look has arrived, quietly, unheralded.

It now takes 7 days for the mail to reach my office.

I long hesitated to admit, even to myself, that my old familiar 4-day rule had been replaced by a brand spanking new 7-day model. But indisputable proof confronted me last Friday, April 10, when the postman delivered a letter to the office at 1 p.m.

I looked at the postmark. The letter had been posted exactly 7 days earlier, at 1 p.m. April 3, from a small town in the State of Washington.

I felt sad, Mr. Speaker, when the truth was forced upon me. Even this had changed and was no more.

But in the midst of my sorrow, there came the gleam of a comforting thought. Maybe, I said to myself, Mr. Summerfield is wiser than us all. Maybe he alone realizes that in the midst of the noise, and complexity and speed of the space age, we need to be reminded that time is eternal, that life will go on, and that we must preserve some of the old values of cumbersomeness, inefficiency and delay.

World Law—The Bridge Between the Danger and the Dream

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES O. PORTER
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 14, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks which I am scheduled to present this evening before the Wilmington, Del. chapter of the United World Federalists:

WORLD LAW—THE BRIDGE BETWEEN THE DANGER AND THE DREAM

Considering the degree and the immediacy of the danger of a thermonuclear world disaster and the apparent remoteness of peace based on world law, it might be appropriate for me to commence my remarks with the words of a hymn. You are probably acquainted with the second verse of "Turn Back O Man, Forswear Thy Foolish Ways," but let me read it to you:

"Earth might be fair and all men glad and wise,
Age after age their tragic empires rise,
Built while they dream, and in that dreaming weep,
Would man but wake from out his haunted sleep,
Earth might be fair and all men glad and wise."

Hymns, fellowship, prayer—all these should be utilized in the search for world peace. We remember what St. Paul preached. We know that faith needs works. We wonder, are we smart enough to survive? Is it in fact too late to avert world disaster? The cosmic clock may indeed indicate 5 minutes after 12, not before 12.

I didn't come here tonight to despair, nor did I come here to bedazzle you with the prospect of a world at peace, a peace insured by effective world law.

PRESENT POLICIES PUSH ATOMIC WAR CLOSER

I didn't come to make you wring your hands and gnash your teeth and tear your hair, although I grant that these responses may be entirely defensible in the light of our present situation and of our policies which are every day pushing us closer to atomic war and to the destruction of our civilization.

I didn't come to describe for you the social, economic, and cultural configurations of a world no longer forced to dissipate its resources in a gigantic arms race.

I did come to Wilmington from Washington to attempt to delineate more precisely the danger confronting the world today and the dream—the attainment of which means escape from this danger. I came to counsel against excesses of both despair and hope. If we have decided to climb Mt. Emerest, we do not give up before we start, nor do we start without considerable preparations, preparations which might be hastened if that summit were soon to be the only place on earth that could sustain life.

So it is with the attainment of workable world law. I want to discuss several particular preparations we can make and, I add, must make immediately.

Washington, D.C., sometimes described as a place of protocol, alcohol, and Geritol, has no monopoly on attempts to solve this problem, and certainly we can't do it without the help of Wilmington, Del., Eugene, Oreg., and people in cities and countries everywhere.

A human being is a frail thing. He can easily be killed. Most of us are reluctantly reconciled to our own personal mortality, but we are appalled at the thought that our children may not have a chance to grow up because of our progress in the arts of weapon making. We would like to figure out how to save them.

We must accurately assess the danger. Are we too alarmist? Is there a balance of terror on which we can rely? Can't we take comfort in the age-old belief that for every offensive weapon man has invented, man has soon developed an effective defense?

THE LINES GROW LONGER

The danger, unquestionably, is unprecedentedly great. We have explosives inconceivably more powerful than any we ever imagined possessing. Let me illustrate. If you use a line 2 inches long to represent the explosive force of an 11,000-pound blockbuster chemical bomb, the largest we had in World War II, in order to represent on the same scale a 3-megaton hydrogen bomb—a relatively small thermonuclear device—you would have to draw a line 20 miles long.

Propulsion and guidance systems are improving rapidly. Our experts assured us more than a year ago that we now were at the stage of "nuclear plenty," which means each of three nations has more than twice or three times enough bombs to wipe out all human life. Our military men talk dispassionately about the "overkill" problem.

THREE WAYS OF TRIGGERING WAR

But just because we have them doesn't mean we'll use them, does it? Let's look at the ways an all-out war could be triggered.

First, intentionally. We have, I am told, an increasing number of military men privately advocating preventive war, their reason being that in no other way will we have a chance because of vast Soviet superiority in missiles. Of course, the Soviets are aware of this reasoning. And we realize they may decide to insure that their missiles get the head start.

Second, war could start accidentally. That is, the result of human error. Many fingers are on many triggers and those fingers belong to fallible human beings.

Third, by unauthorized action, as where, without proper authority, a custodian of a weapon decides, for reasons of insanity, venality, idealism or perhaps alcohol, to cause a thermonuclear explosion.

We have laws, customs and mechanical safeguards galore with reference to the use of small arms, but a lot of people get hurt and killed with them every day.

A single atomic explosion in these times of tension would be hard to interpret except as an aggressive act, the precursor of an all-out attack. There would be no wreckage to examine, no witnesses to question, only the necessity to judge instantly whether retaliation was in order. I submit to you that the man who had to make the decision would not be inclined to characterize any mysterious blast as anything but an attack.

Until tensions in the world can be reduced, any accidental or unauthorized explosion is likely to set in motion toward all-out war forces which cannot be stopped.

FANTASTIC SPECULATION

Do I speculate fantastically? I wish I could say I did. Let me read what the Rand Corp. said last July on this subject, this corporation being, as many of you know, in effect the private brains of our Air Force:

"It should be recognized that all-out nuclear war could start in many ways, other than by a premeditated Soviet attack. A local war might become so invested with national interests and prestige that Soviet leaders, if faced with decisive defeat, would choose to counter with an all-out attack. This danger has probably increased because Khrushchev seems less cautious than Stalin, less secure in his grasp of power, yet freer to exercise his diplomacy on a global scale. War might occur because of miscalculation of U.S. intentions; in a period of acute tension, verbal and even military indicators would be difficult to interpret, and the premium on a first strike might well tempt the USSR to launch a pre-emptive attack. War might even begin by accident, triggered by a chance release of weapons, and carried on because both sides were poised in a high state of alert for quick and nearly automatic retaliation. Finally, as just mentioned, we cannot rule out the possibility that the United States, faced with a major Soviet challenge, might sometime be forced to resist militarily, even at the risk of devastation."

Later in the same report, a note of hope, at least as to fallout, was sounded:

"To conclude: Despite many unresolved questions about long-term fallout, it seems to be a sound generalization that long-term radiation problems are a less critical threat to the survival of a population than the central short-term problem, namely, how to protect a substantial fraction of the population from the immediate disaster of a nuclear war."

However, disclosures subsequently indicate that food supplies may be far more critical because of long-term radiation, so perhaps even that vestige of comfort is denied us.

ARE WE SMART ENOUGH TO SURVIVE?

The danger is clear and deadly and immediate, yet the usual reaction, when not entirely due to ignorance, is either an indifferent fatalism or a sappy kind of optimistic incredulity. One attitude is summed up in the words, "Well there's nothing we can do about it," and the other in the words, "Things look tough all right but we'll muddle through again." These attitudes may be entirely adequate from a personal mental hygiene point of view but they are not going to help us survive.

There are many things we can do about this danger and we certainly can't count on muddling through. The question is, Are we smart enough to survive? Are we smart enough to apprehend the danger, to conceive the solution and then to proceed step by step to its fulfillment? I don't know. You don't know. We wonder. We hope. We pray.

What about the dream, the solution, a world under law? It isn't so complex nor is it in itself controversial. We don't have war among the States of our Nation—not any more. We have a Federal system. What is controversial is the feasibility of even trying to attain this sort of system for the world. The usual accusations are that those who want world law are out to weaken our position with respect to the Soviet Union and also that such a system would mean an invasion of our sovereignty with interference in local affairs.

WORLD LAW IS THE SOLUTION FOR OUR WEAPONS CRISIS

Let me now call a few witnesses in support of my proposition that world law is the solution for our weapons crisis.

The President has said so. Last August his Assistant Secretary of State for International Organization Affairs, Francis O. Wilcox, expressed administration policy in these words:

"In this nuclear age, when we are all faced with annihilation, man must continue relentlessly his eternal quest for peace. In this quest I believe that our best hope still lies in the concept of collective security and in taking what steps we can to strengthen the peace machinery of the United Nations."

Sometimes the White House and the Republicans in Congress differ, but apparently not on this point. Consider what Senator STYLES BRIDGES, head of the Republican policy committee, said on the floor of the Senate last July 23:

"But we are confronted today with the awful fact that thermonuclear devices make war a threat of total destruction of the civilized world. We face catastrophe if we allow the world to drift into another world war. We may not be able to escape war in any event, but we have a sacred duty to all mankind to try to find another way out.

"Aside from naked power politics, backed by each nation's armed strength, our only hope lies in developing the power of the community, as presently represented by the United Nations, to deal with the trouble spots that lead to war.

"The United Nations cannot control the actions of the great powers. If they are determined to make war, the United Nations will be powerless to stop them.

"But the great powers drift into war by lining up on opposite sides in the crises that occur in smaller nations. If we give the United Nations power to deal constructively with these events and conditions, we can remove many of the causes which set the great powers against each other, and thereby make world war less likely."

The Senator and I disagree on many issues, but not on this one.

HOW DO WE USE THE WORLD LAW CONCEPT?

What is the program? How do we use the concept of world law to bridge the gap between the danger of war and the dream of peace? The short and general answer is that we educate and discipline ourselves so that our executive and legislative branches proceed to carry out a vigorous public consensus demanding that we proceed to strengthen the United Nations and thus permit general massive disarmament.

The longer and more specific answer has, among others, these lines of action:

1. We must set about at once to consider strengthening the United Nations. Article 109 of the United Nations Charter provides procedures for calling a Charter Review Conference. In 1955 and again in 1957 this Conference was postponed pending more auspicious international circumstances.

The Committee on Arrangements for a United National Charter Review Conference meets this June. It is my hope that the United States at that time will urge the Committee to recommend to the United Nations General Assembly that governments establish national commissions, or instruct national bodies, to undertake studies to determine their position on charter review.

I want to read to you the text of a resolution to be introduced in the Congress this week by myself and several colleagues:

"Whereas the basic purpose of the foreign policy of the United States of America is to protect the freedom of its citizens; and

"Whereas the United States seeks freedom, peace, and prosperity for the peoples of all nations; and

"Whereas the United States has joined with other nations to pursue these goals through the United Nations; and

"Whereas enforceable law has proven to be indispensable to the attainment of these goals and to the peaceful and just settlement of disputes within all civilized communities: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that it should be United States policy to seek, through the United Nations, the development of world law to protect the freedom, peace, and just aspirations of all peoples, to provide for the peaceful settlement of international disputes, and to permit the elimination of national armaments; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution will be sent to the President of the United States, who is hereby requested to initiate studies at the highest level of the changes which should be made in the Charter of the United Nations or in the charters of other international organizations to further the development of world law for the purposes enumerated in this resolution; and, pursuant to this goal; be it further

"Resolved, That the United States Government should urge the United Nations Committee on Arrangements for a United Nations Charter Review Conference, when it meets in June 1959, to recommend to the United Nations General Assembly that governments establish national commissions, or instruct appropriate national bodies, to undertake studies to determine their positions on charter review or revision in order to facilitate fruitful consideration of suitable measures to strengthen the United Nations Charter as an effective legislative, executive, and judicial instrument of world law when a Charter Review Conference is held."

In my opinion the very act of seeking to strengthen the United Nations would lessen tensions among nations today and reduce the likelihood of a war by design or a war triggered by an accidental or unauthorized act.

2. Proposals in the Congress and by the Vice President to increase the power of the World Court should proceed on their own and also as part of United Nations Charter revision studies. Senators HUMPHREY and MORSE, among others, propose to allow the Court to decide whether an issue is domestic or not. The Vice President wants the Court to interpret treaties so as to bind the parties. These would be gigantic steps forward away from war and toward peace.

3. The establishment of a United Nations police force, as urged by both the Congress and the President, could be done by action in the United Nations General Assembly. As presently conceived, it would be only for observation and patrol but if, as has been urged from many quarters, such as organization were used to supervise all armed forces in Berlin, its functions might well, in time, grow into something more formidable and effective.

4. Cessation of atomic testing. It was most encouraging that the Geneva talks were recently resumed. Any kind of an international inspection system would be a significant step forward. A would-be violator would have to consider the impact not only of world opinion, but the opinion of his own people.

5. Massive disarmament as proposed by Sir Philip Noel-Baker and others, on a multilateral basis and with proper safeguards of course, is possible. It is also realistic. The other evening Noel-Baker, the great authority on world disarmament, took violent exception to my using the word "dream" to describe world peace through world law. "The romanticists," he said, "are those persons who believe war can be prevented by an arms race." He went on to point out that no country can defend itself today, no matter how much it spends. You might, for a while, defend an airfield or launching site, but not the people. The cities are vulnerable, naked, defenseless. I agree with him that negotiations on a multilateral arms-limitation agreement, of great scope, ought to be begun without delay and with the utmost determination and intelligence.

6. The informing of public opinion here and elsewhere, as by discussions of the danger, the dream, and the programs by organizations like yours, and also the League of Women Voters, labor unions, churches, and schools. The monumental book "World Peace Through World Law," by Grenville Clark and Louis Sohn, should be used as the basis for profitable sessions. Unofficial international meetings should be held whenever possible to discuss these matters.

AN INFORMED PUBLIC OPINION

Our Government is based on public opinion. In these times it is more necessary than ever before that this public opinion, which elects our leaders, be informed.

No doubt you can suggest improvements on this program. Please do. I could add my own personal project of establishing a chapter in the United States Congress of the World Parliament Association. It will be called Members of Congress for World Law. I could also mention the personal security plans my able and respected friend, Ralph Lapp, the atomic publicist, has for the safety of himself and his family if they survive the first nuclear blast. They have supplies stored away in a shelter not too far out of Washington. He is neither a fatalist nor a sappy optimist, but most of us are one or both.

THE BALANCE OF TERROR

The other night, when I had the privilege of talking with Philip Noel-Baker, he ended his remarks to our small group by saying he believed that very substantial arms reductions were not only critically necessary but technically feasible in terms of effective inspection procedures.

"On the other hand," he said, "I believe that within 10 years we will all be dead and that the earth will be an incinerated relic."

The man sitting next to him, one of our highest scientific policy advisers for the administration, added without hesitation and with somber sincerity, "I believe so, too."

They may well be right. I refuse to believe that they are. It may indeed be 5 minutes after midnight; but, since we are not able to see this cosmic clock and because we want our children to have a chance to grow up, we have no honorable course but to proceed as though there was still time to save the world from becoming an "incinerated relic."

I started with a hymn and I shall end with the closing verse of "Turn Back O Man."

"Earth shall be fair, and all her people one,
Nor till that hour shall God's whole will be done.
Now, even now, once more from earth to sky
Peals forth in joy man's old undaunted cry:
'Earth shall be fair, and all her folks be one.' "

Thank you very much.

Voters Support Eisenhower Policies

OF

HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 14, 1959

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, following the recent Easter recess, the chairman of the Republican policy committee, Mr. BYRNES, joined with me in inviting Republican House Members to report informally on current sentiment in their home congressional districts on these four topics: First, the fight for a balanced budget; second, the adequacy of our defense program; third, the Berlin crisis and the international situation; and fourth, resistance to spendthrift Federal programs.

The response from our membership was gratifying and enlightening. The replies were carefully examined by Mr. BYRNES and myself and were the subject of a detailed report made to the President this morning at the White House leadership conference.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following joint release reporting on our findings by topic and by geographical area:

JOINT RELEASE BY HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK, OF INDIANA, HOUSE REPUBLICAN LEADER, AND HON. JOHN W. BYRNES OF WISCONSIN, CHAIRMAN OF THE HOUSE REPUBLICAN POLICY COMMITTEE

WASHINGTON, April 14.—Reports from Republican House Members, back in Washington after spending the Easter recess in their own districts, indicate overwhelming support for administration policies on several fronts, according to House Republican Leader CHARLES A. HALLECK and JOHN W. BYRNES, chairman of the Republican Policy Committee.

HALLECK and BYRNES earlier had asked their Republican colleagues to pass along reactions of the folks back home to four current issues.

A survey of replies indicated widespread voter support of efforts by the President and Republicans in Congress to achieve a balanced Federal budget.

By the same token, an overwhelming majority of people back home trust President Eisenhower's judgment on the Nation's defense needs, the returning Congressmen told HALLECK and BYRNES.

The President's firm stand on the Berlin situation is receiving widespread approval, most citizens being convinced that appeasement of the Russians would be a grave mistake, in the opinion of Congressmen answering the Halleck-Byrnes inquiry.

Spendthrift programs got a thumbs-down reaction almost everywhere, the GOP members reported.

Following are some of the typical replies received by HALLECK and BYRNES from their colleagues:

Pacific States

"The general public is demanding retrenchment in spending which will lead to a reduction in taxes" (California).

"I feel we need to dramatize more of our issues because factual talk about balanced budgets, and inflation, and fiscal responsibility doesn't have the emotional appeal of the 'doing something for somebody' programs" (Washington).

"My mail indicates the public generally is for curtailing new and costly programs" (Washington).

Chamber of Commerce Week

OF

HON. EDWIN B. DOOLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 14, 1959

Mr. DOOLEY. Mr. Speaker, the current week is known as Chamber of Commerce Week. Evidence that there is nothing new under the sun keeps turning up in the most unlikely places. From far off Mesopotamia comes proof that the local chamber of commerce—that symbol of jet-age enterprise—actually had its counterpart in the ancient city of Mari some 6,000 years ago.

If archeologists who plied their trade amid those ruins have read their cunieform tablets correctly, the administrative palace of the Kingdom of Mari boasted both a foreign office and a board of trade, and from all accounts, business was really booming. In his book, "The Bible as History," Warner Keller tells us, "More than 100 officials were involved in dealing with the incoming and outgoing messages, which amounted to thousands of tablets."

Babylon had its chambers of commerce, too, apparently within the shadow of the Tower of Babel and the fabulous Hanging Gardens. During the Middle Ages, fairs and merchant guilds were the predominent businessmen's organizations. The predecessor of the modern chamber of commerce was started during the reign of the French King, Henry, with the establishment of the Superior Chambers of Commerce of France. About that time, too, the merchants of Marseilles formed an independent voluntary group to represent the commercial interests of their port. This early local was closely akin to that country's present day chambers of commerce, voluntary organizations having quasi-public functions. Today these groups have charge of stock and produce exchanges, issue export certificates, and even help manage the port cities. They also differ from their American counterparts in that their membership is smaller, ranging from 9 to 21.

Switzerland has two distinct types—those that follow the French concept and function under state auspices, and independent groups similar to our own. The German chambers, like those in France, are pretty much official institutions. On the other hand, in Britain they are, like our own, entirely voluntary organizations.

And speaking of differences, our own chambers of commerce really evolved from three somewhat different types of business groups, each fulfilling a particular need created by a particular time and place. There were the trading organizations, whose members met for the sole purpose of trading with one another. These were sometimes known as boards of trade, a name that still survives in some areas, particularly small towns. Then there were the protective organizations—businessmen who banded together against high taxes and discriminatory regulations. And finally, in the newer sections of the country, town boosters organized to seek new industries and good roads that would draw tourist travel and help the community grow.

Regardless of these differences, the common goal of all three types of business groups was progress. But in a country marked by rapid growth and change as ours has been, what today may pass as progress can become, almost overnight, somewhat of a mixed blessing. For example, as the horse-and-buggy days slipped further into history, the big move to the new population centers brought new problems. But the oldtimers saw no personal profit from becoming bigger cities, and they often voted down needed public improvement programs. Nevertheless the growth of America's cities was as inevitable as the industrial revolution, and so chambers of commerce became the vehicles by which civic-minded people could be mobilized "to build bigger communities by making them better."

The stock market crash brought a somewhat different problem, though. As land values went down, so did the municipality's ability to service their overextended bond capacity. Faced with high municipal taxes, the businessmen took a new look at their organization, and belatedly they became tax conscious. Today the role of guardian of the taxpayer's pocketbook is an established function of the chamber of commerce.

Until 1912, the chamber of commerce movement had little or no cohesiveness. Then President Taft urged a group of businessmen to form what later became the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. Now there are 32 State and regional chambers, but the backbone of the movement still remains the local unit. And these days its business is not all business, either. The local chamber of commerce provides the leadership for all kinds of community activities—a project for the handicapped, the building of a playground, a fund drive to send city kids to camp.

As a matter of fact, projects aimed at helping youngsters rate high among chamber of commerce-sponsored activities. But then this preoccupation with the problems of America's children is nothing new in chamber of commerce history. The records show that the Ohio Chamber of Commerce—the oldest in the country—was responsible for the enactment of the first child labor law in the Nation.

Three Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of Dutch Landing

OF
HON. JAMES ROOSEVELT OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 14, 1959

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, on March 14, 1959, the second annual banquet of the Holland Society of New York, Potomac branch, was held at the Mayflower Hotel in Washington, D.C. This banquet marked the opening of the festivities commemorating the 350th anniversary of the landing of the Dutch at New Amsterdam.

I am particularly pleased to bring this significant occasion to the attention of my colleagues, as I am a life-long member of the Holland Society as was my father before me.

Messages were received at the banquet by numerous prominent persons, including His Excellency J. H. van Roijen, Netherlands Ambassador to the United States, whose greeting read as follows:

> Congratulations to the Potomac Branch of the Holland Society on initiating the 350th anniversary of the landing of our people on your shores and the commemoration of this year of history.

President Eisenhower wired greetings, as follows:

> It is a pleasure to send greetings to the members and guests of the Potomac Branch of the Holland Society of New York gathered on the occasion of the 350th anniversary of the Dutch explorations by Henry Hudson. From the earliest days, the growth and spirit of our country have been strengthened by citizens of Dutch descent. The Holland Society helps to preserve an important quality of American culture. I am delighted to add my best wishes for a fine evening.
> DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

I should like to touch briefly on some of the historical highlights in connection with the settling of the Dutch on what is now known as Manhattan. For instance, Netherlands' Prince Bernhard said, on May 19, 1958:

> The Netherlands and the United States can pride themselves on very old cultural relations. In 1638 Holland provided your country with its first schoolmaster, Adam Roelants. An early President of the United States, John Quincy Adams, opened a long line of American students seeking knowledge at Dutch universities, when at the age of 13 he registered as a student at the University of Leyden.
> You who are friends of my country and whose ancestors in many cases came from there, have set yourselves the task of advancing the friendship and cultural relations between our two countries.

There was a tablet in the court of the recently demolished Produce Exchange near the Customs House in downtown New York that marked the location of the first school in New Amsterdam, taught by Adam Roelandsen. It was also the first school of which there is any record in America.

Another first: In 1648, when the northernmost limits of the town extended no further than Wall Street, Gov. Pieter Stuyvesant laid the basic foundations of New York's and the Nation's volunteer fire-fighting system when he appointed four fire wardens.

A medical first in America: When the 17th century began, doctors cured much more by personality than by their remedies and practices. As a consequence, this era witnessed the discoveries of Antony van Leeuwenhoek, who built the microscope and was the first to describe the corpuscular formation of the blood, and those arising from Christian Huyghens' epochal studies in the field of optics. Dutch colonial America was the scene of several probable "firsts," notably the first coroner's inquest—1658—and establishment of the first hospital—1659.

The three Presidents: Three Presidents of the United States have been of direct descent in the male line from settlers of New Netherland well in advance of 1675. At least as many more occupants of the White House have been in part of such ancient stock through marriage. These three Presidents were also Governors of the State of New York. The first of the trio was Martin Van Buren, the second was Theodore Roosevelt—a very active member of the Holland Society—and the third was Franklin Delano Roosevelt, my father.

Our flag: The Andria Doria, bearing a copy of the Declaration of Independence of July 4, 1776, and her commission from the Continental Congress, signed by John Hancock, with copies in blank, signed by the same, for the equipment of privateers, and with a 13-striped flag flying at her masthead, sailed into the roadstead of St. Eustatius on the 16th of November 1776. She dropped anchor before Orangetown and in front of Fort Orange. The commander of the fort, Abraham Ravenle, on seeing the character of the vessel, and recognizing the flag of the American Congress, was in a quandary.

What should he do? Should he salute it with the full number of "honor shots" which were usually accorded to men-of-war of a recognized nation and thus officially recognize sovereignty of the United States of America? He was ordered by Governor De Graeff to return the salute with two guns less, as if the Andria Doria were a merchantman. Upon the commander's return to the fort, the Dutch garrison belched forth a salute of 11 guns. Following this event were serious repercussions. Governor De Graeff was subsequently recalled to Holland. The English protested in no uncertain terms to the Netherlands Government and accused it of violating its neutrality in recognizing an enemy.

EVACUATION DAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1783

Their discovery is a feat even more difficult than that performed by Symon's great-great-grandson, Sgt. John van Arsdale, who, after fighting against the British in the War of the American Revolution and being captured, imprisoned, and nearly starved to death by them, on evacuation day at New York, November 25, 1783, climbed the tall greased flagpole at the battery, tore down the British flag, and fastened the American flag there. The British had evacuated the city at noon, leaving their flag flying, after secretly greasing the pole. American military orders for the day were that the American flag should be raised upon the pole when General Washington appeared at the battery. At the vital moment the order could not be executed; the humiliation was intense; no one was able to climb the pole—until a young man in the crowd of spectators volunteered. He was John van Arsdale, who, having been a sailor in his father's ship, climbed the pole, tore down the flag, and substituted Old Glory. Upon descending, he received an ovation and a gift of money, to which General Washington contributed. (Hoppin, "The Washington Ancestry," vol. III, p. 164.)

Many fortunes have been made in New York City real estate since the Indians traded Manhattan to Peter Minuit for trinkets worth $24.

Today's value of all land and buildings, less tax-exempt holdings, on Manhattan Island is far in excess of $10 billion. The Dutch certainly got a bargain for their beads.

National Allergy Month

OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 14, 1959

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a joint resolution authorizing the President to issue a proclamation designating the month beginning August 15 and ending September 15 as National Allergy Month. Its purpose is to urge the people of this Nation to cooperate in the fight for the prevention, treatment, and cure of allergic illness and to invite the communities of the United States to mobilize and extend their health resources to more adequately take care of the growing number of our citizens afflicted with these diseases.

The allergic diseases include both common and rare conditions. Some are so serious as to threaten life, others are no more than annoyances. But, all impair health, happiness, and productivity and many decrease longevity. While most of us are familiar, at least by the name, with bronchial asthma, hay fever, allergic eczema, allergic headaches, abnormal reactions to drugs, and the contact skin eruptions so common in industry, we are less familiar with the diseases of an allergic nature which affect the heart and circulatory system, the blood cells, the gastrointestinal tract, the kidneys, and nervous system. Among the important systemic diseases suspected of having an allergic basis are rheumatic fever, ulcerative colitis, certain types of nephritis, and that group of conditions which are known collectively as the collagen diseases.

The allergic diseases are a leading cause of acute disease and chronic disability among individuals in every decade of life, but especially among children since the initial symptoms of allergy appear more often in the first two decades of life than at any other time. Allergic diseases are also among the leading causes of death among children.

Long neglected because they do not have the reputation of being killers, the allergic diseases are now recognized as major causes of disability, invalidism, and absenteeism from school, business, and industry. It is conservatively estimated that a minimum of 17 million Americans suffer during their lives from an allergic disease, ranging from annoying hay fever to severe, crippling and often incapacitating asthma. Minor allergic episodes, such as isolated attacks of poison ivy dermatitis, affect more than half our total population at one time or another.

The two most common distinct allergic diseases are asthma and hay fever. So far as our civilian population is concerned, the U.S. Public Health Service ranks hay fever and asthma third in prevalence among the chronic diseases—following diseases of the heart and circulation and arthritis and rheumatism. Together, asthma and hay fever account for more than 25 million work-days lost each year.

ALLERGY IN CHILDREN

The overall incidence of allergies in children is about 14 percent. In a study of 1,225 children, aged 1 to 14 years, chosen at random from a general population, no fewer than 175 children were diagnosed as definitely allergic and 220 as probably allergic. Multiple allergies were found to occur in slightly more than 3 out of 4 allergic children. Three-quarters of the patients with eczema had respiratory allergies and/or asthma.

Food allergy, especially that to cow's milk, causing gastrointestinal symptoms and infantile eczema is the most common type of allergy in early infancy. In children, respiratory allergies are the most troublesome disorders. In this group, food allergy is somewhat replaced by sensitivity to pollens, animal danders and hair, and bacterial infection. Studies show that more than 50 percent of children with eczema develop asthma. More than 40 percent with respiratory allergies eventually develop bronchial asthma.

Prophylaxis and treatment of major allergies in early childhood may not only prevent asthma and hay fever but also reduce the frequency of recurring upper respiratory infections.

Patients under 20 have a much better prospect of obtaining marked relief from most types of allergy than do older people. Early diagnosis and competent allergic, medical, dermatologic, and sometimes psychiatric management can prevent both the troublesome complications that arise from long-standing allergy and some of the secondary changes that produce recurring disability.

ASTHMA

While asthma may begin at any age, the majority of cases begin in childhood. If neglected, the disease tends to recur and become chronic so that it may lead to serious, disabling pulmonary disease in adult life. Infants with eczema and children with hay fever are apt to develop asthma. The popular belief that the asthmatic child will outgrow his condition is a dangerous one. If the asthma is neglected, it tends to persist. Even if it does subside spontaneously, it may leave its victim handicapped physically and psychologically.

Asthma is one of the more frequent causes of referral to pediatric outpatient clinics and children's hospital wards each year. It has been stated that the odds are 8 or 9 to 1 that a child with asthma will grow out of it. Unhappily, without the assistance of early preventive measures, many asthmatic children develop severe complications difficult to treat.

Perhaps the most common complication of asthma is emphysema, or overdistention of the lungs. The lungs become voluminous; they have very little mobility. Oxygenation of the blood is impaired. The patient becomes short of breath on even light exertion and sometimes even at rest.

There is extra risk for asthmatics from surgical procedures. Medico-actuarial studies consistently show that a great part of the excess mortality among asthmatic persons is due to high death rates from respiratory complications of the disease itself and from pneumonia, heart disease, and tuberculosis. Insurance experiences would indicate that asthmatic victims are relatively less resistent to diseases involving the respiratory system than are nonasthmatics. Insurance studies indicate that the mortality rate for patients with asthma, taken as a group, is appreciably greater than for nonasthmatics and consequently their average length of life is somewhat less. The presence of asthma in an individual is not compatible with a high level of general health and efficiency.

ALLERGY IN INDUSTRY: OCCUPATIONAL ALLERGIES

In our system of free enterprise, the unimpaired health of the worker is essential to the continued growth and expansion of the national productive effort and so, to the Nation's welfare. Our national productive capacity is reduced, not only by the great killing diseases of man, but also by conditions which sap our national vitality through insidious inroads on the health of the worker, be he an executive, a craftsman, or a laborer. The allergic diseases are among the chronic conditions which lead to substandard work performance, excessive absenteeism, and a continuous demand for medical attention.

The allergic diseases reduce longevity. They kill many individuals prematurely and contribute to other deaths by predisposing to heart and lung disease. But their importance lies in the toll they exact from our working population, day by day and year after year. Where allergic conditions arise from occupational exposures, an increasingly frequent situation in this age of chemicals and synthetic products, compensation awards add to the financial losses.

The incidence of allergy among the general population exceeds 10 percent. It is double this in many industries where workers are exposed to allergens by contact or inhalation. At least 20 percent of occupational conditions are allergic, and these are largely conditions which recur again and again.

Industrial progress has intensified the problem of allergy. There is widespread evidence of sensitization to industrial chemical agents, including the constantly increasing number of new compounds used in our modern technology.

Allergic contact skin disease is one of the most common diseases in industry today. It is frequently seen, for example, among workers who handle dyes and dye intermediates, photographic developers, rubber accelerators and antioxidants, soaps, mercury solutions, plants and plant derivatives, insecticides, plastics, and antibiotics.

DRUG SENSITIVITY

Allergic reactions are provoked in sensitive individuals by many of the drugs commonly used in medical treatment, including such well-known drugs as aspirin, quinine, arsenic, the barbiturates, the bromides and iodides, and sulfa drugs. Biological products such as insulin, liver extract, other hormones, and serums, also may produce allergic reactions. The numbers of persons affected year by year is in the thousands. While many such reactions are mild and are terminated by the withdrawal of the drug, others are extremely serious and even fatal.

The problem of drug sensitivity has become increasingly important during recent years since the multiplication of new compounds used in medical treatment has led to a proportionate increase in the number of drug reactions. Among the most common offenders today are the antibiotics.

Allergic reactions to the antibiotics have increased in proportion to the extended use of these agents. Penicillin is particularly apt to produce allergic reactions and, because penicillin is the most commonly used antibiotic, reactions to it have been reported in great numbers. A survey made in 1956 revealed the thousands of reactions to penicillin annually, with deaths numbering in the hundreds.

While the antibiotics have saved thousands of lives and reduced the length and severity of infections in millions of people, allergic reactions are sufficiently frequent and serious as to pose an important medical problem.

THE ALLERGY PROBLEM TODAY

At present, large sums are being expended for research in infantile paralysis, tuberculosis, rheumatism and heart disease, cancer, multiple sclerosis, prematurity and so forth. Allergy affects as many children as do any one of these, yet there is practically no money being expended on its study. The reason for this is that death seldom results from an allergy despite its incapacitating and chronic character.

Despite the amount of disability they cause, the allergic diseases have received relatively little attention in the development of specialized facilities for treatments, in research and in medical education. Even in cities with the best of general hospitals, it is often difficult or impossible for the asthmatic patient of modest means to obtain adequate care. Severe asthma requires the most intensive medical and nursing service, yet may persist far longer than the acute stage of most other diseases. As a result, hospitals treating acute diseases are often reluctant to admit such patients and institutions offering chronic care are poorly equipped to handle them.

The number of allergy patients seen in outpatient clinics of hospitals and in the offices of physicians is sufficiently striking, but even more so is the number of patient visits. Statistics provided by the United Hospital Fund of New York City reveal that allergy sufferers require on an average three times as many clinic or office visits per year than do those suffering from all other types of illness.

What is being done to help the millions of Americans suffering from allergic diseases? The Allergy Foundation of America, a voluntary health agency established under the sponsorship of the two national professional societies, the American Academy of Allergy and the American College of Allergists, has developed a broad program of public information and education intended to guide the allergic individual in obtaining the best possible medical care. This agency attempts to bring to the public reliable information on the latest scientific knowledge about allergy, and the management and treatment of the allergic diseases.

In order to accelerate efforts in the field of allergy, the foundation complements the expanded program of research and training of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases by offering opportunities for specialized training for medical students, graduate physicians and research scientists in the form of scholarships, fellowships, and grants.

The Allergy Foundation of America initiated National Allergy Month 2 years ago with the purpose of disseminating as widely as possible information concerning allergy as a growing health problem. For each of the past 2 years the educational campaign conducted during this month has been highly successful and several hundred thousands of informational pamphlets have been distributed to the public in an effort to inform and educate our citizens. The Allergy Foundation of America plans to sponsor a National Allergy Month again this year, August 15–September 15. To this end, the joint resolution which I have today introduced in conjunction with Senator LISTER HILL, will seek to obtain Presidential proclamation urging Americans to support this program through voluntary gifts and services in their communities.

A Good Neighbor: Senator Humphrey on Latin America

OF
HON. CHARLES O. PORTER
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 14, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, at the University of Florida on April 3 of this year the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, the Honorable HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, delivered a speech on Latin America.

It is exceptional. It is a brilliant résumé of the existing problems between the governments of Latin America and the Government of the United States.

The Senator has come to grips with the central issues involved without the cliches and generalities so prevalent in discussions of Latin America.

Under a previous consent, I am including the text of Senator HUMPHREY'S statement in the RECORD.

A NEW ERA FOR LATIN AMERICA

(Address prepared for delivery by Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, University of Florida, Gainesville, Fla., Friday night, April 3, 1959)

Tonight I might have selected as my topic the Berlin crisis, the troubled Middle East or the vexing problem of attempting to control the nuclear arms race. But I have chosen instead to talk about Latin America and U.S. policy toward her Latin American neighbors. Since the end of World War II we have been preoccupied with a series of crises on the periphery of the Communist empire—Greece, Berlin, Korea, Indochina, Suez, Quemoy, Lebanon, and again Berlin. In the meantime, the seemingly less precarious situation in Latin America went almost unnoticed.

It took the demonstrations against Vice President NIXON last spring to explode any remaining illusions about the state of our Latin American relations. The plain truth is that today inter-American relations are in a more critical stage than they have been at any time in the past three decades.

At this point, I would like to pause to pay tribute to the University of Florida, one of the few U.S. universities which has a well-rounded Latin American studies program. Recently, the Hispanic Foundation of the Library of Congress surveyed universities across the country to find out which ones offered Latin American studies. I am told that only eight universities fall into category I, that is, ones which offer a well-staffed, well-rounded course of study about Latin America. The University of Florida is one of these eight. Florida's awareness of the importance of inter-American understanding also has been reflected in the thoughtful and persistent efforts of Senator SMATHERS to bring attention to the realities of our foreign policy in Latin America.

We are now on the threshold of the 69th anniversary of the Organization of American States. It has long been customary at this time of the year to extol pan-American peace, solidarity, and cooperation. Such oratory now would be a gratuitous gesture. It is dangerous to perpetuate comfortable fictions about a bond that has been broken. The first prerequisite of a responsible and effective policy toward Latin America is a willingness to face the facts, however unpleasant they may be.

OUR STAKE IN LATIN AMERICA

There is no disagreement on the importance of cordial, cooperative relations with our 20 sister Republics. Everyone agrees that strategically, ICBM's notwithstanding, Latin America remains one of the key foundations of our defense shield. Politically, close and harmonious relations with the Latin American people, who now number over 180 million, add to the free world's strength in the larger issues of the cold war.

Economically, the American Republics constitute a vital ingredient in our own well-being. The area is second only to Europe as a purchaser of our exports. Twenty-five percent of all our exports go there. In 1957 this meant the sale of $560 million worth of automobiles and parts, of $445 million worth of chemicals, $135 million of medicines, $121 million of edible animal products, and so on across the board of U.S. products. Latin American purchases add up to a lot of jobs for a lot of people in the United States. At the same time, imports from south of the Rio Grande consist of many strategic minerals as well as materials essential to our peacetime industries. U.S. private investments in the area now total over $9 billion, more than in any other region of the world.

Why, then, have relations deteriorated?

CRISIS POLICY

Part of the responsibility lies in our preoccupation with Europe, the Middle East, and Asia. While attention to these vital areas is understandable, the resulting neglect of Latin America cannot be justified. The personal diplomacy of the administration has also tended in the same direction. With all decisionmaking power concentrated in Secretary Dulles, the less precarious situation in Latin America got shoved into the background until it too became a crisis. Up until the recent disturbances, I am told, Foreign Service officers working in Latin America were somehow considered to be occupying second-class positions.

TAKING LATIN AMERICA FOR GRANTED

The good-neighbor policy itself may be partly to blame for the assumption that nothing much could go wrong within our hemisphere. Latin American representatives tried to make their grievances heard through proper channels and at stated conferences. Often their warnings and protests were bitter. But the good-neighbor policy had been so successful in cementing United States-Latin American relations that long after its demise an aura of good will lingered on, hiding the grim realities underneath. The hangover from the good-neighbor policy seems to have created an impression in the United States that the Latin American republics were solidly with us, no matter what we did or did not do.

LATIN-AMERICAN REVOLUTIONS

The attitude of taking Latin America for granted is only part of the growing estrangement between the United States and Latin America. I think that our gravest error has been a misreading of the revolution gripping the region. Some people are prone to dismiss Latin American revolts as mere changes in the palace guard, while others see Communist influence in every upheaval. These stereotypes can be our undoing.

Today, the nations to the south are in the midst of an epic social revolution. We and the Communists have vied with each other in telling people the world over that they no longer have to live out their lives in hopeless misery. The peoples of Latin America took us at our word.

They want an end to semifeudal conditions in which 5 percent of the population owns 80 to 90 percent of the land; in which a handful of nationals and foreigners live in luxury while the majority live in squalor; in which disease strikes down their children, and hunger and ignorance perpetuate their slavery; in which the wealthy minority joins with the army to keep things just as they are.

Many thousands of Latin Americans have risked exile, imprisonment, torture, and death to achieve responsible governments, responsive to the needs of their people. These courageous people usually come from the classes that produce political leadership—students, union leaders, professional and business men. The rash of revolutions that toppled tyrannies in Argentina, Colombia, Venezuela, and Cuba attests to their determination to achieve freedom and bread.

THE LATIN AMERICAN IMAGE OF THE UNITED STATES

In the midst of that upheaval, which we above all other peoples should be able to understand and to sympathize with, the United States has somehow managed to appear callous and indifferent. While we have eagerly sought Latin American support to stop the spread of Communist tyranny, we have demonstrated a peculiar nonchalance toward despotisms of the home-grown variety.

In 1954 Secretary Dulles took time to fly to the ninth Inter-American Conference in Caracas to press for an inter-American declaration against Communist intervention in the Western Hemisphere. That very same year we bestowed the Legion of Merit on Pérez Jiménez then the hated dictator of Venezuela. The incredible citation reads in part:

"To H. E. Marcos Pérez Jiménez, President of the Republic of Venezuela for the exceptional nature of his outstanding accomplishments. His Excellency, as President of the Republic of Venezuela and previously, has demonstrated a spirit of friendship and cooperation with the United States. The sound economic, financial, and foreign investment policies advocated and pursued by his administration have contributed greatly to the economic well-being of his country, and to the rapid development of its tremendous resources. These policies, judiciously combined with a far reaching public works program, have remarkably improved its education, sanitation, transportation, housing, and other important basic facilities."

Shortly after our tribute to Pérez Jiménez, the Archbishop of Caracas dared to denounce the tyrant in a pastoral letter, and thousands of anguished Venezuelans hazarded their lives to get rid of the bloody oppressor upon whom we had lavished praise.

On January 10, 1958—just 13 days before unarmed men, women, and children rose heroically against the brutal Venezuelan dictatorship—the man who had been our Ambassador to Venezuela from 1951 to 1956 wrote from his new post in Turkey to the dictator's savage secret-police chief congratulating him for putting down the first abortive revolt. The letter, on Foreign Service stationery, came to light after the democratic revolution.

These incidents are, unfortunately, not isolated. Our Defense Department, in the middle of the Cuban revolt, decorated the officer who had commanded air raids against the Cuban people. We kept up a stream of armaments to Batista long after it had become apparent that he was using them against his own people, contrary to the terms of our defense agreement.

The Communists, of course, are getting a lot of mileage out of such errors. But we must face up to the fact that our own actions, not Communist propaganda, have created throughout Latin America an image of the United States as a nation selfishly engrossed in defending its own freedoms but heedless of the aspirations of others.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION IS SERIOUS

U.S. official attitudes with regard to Latin America's economic problems have deepened the estrangement between us.

Our economic attitudes toward Latin America have created the image of the United States are arrogant, paternal, interested primarily in promoting the interests of U.S. investors, and unconcerned for the well-being of ordinary human beings. It is painful to think that the generous impulse of the United States, which first created the idea of technical assistance in Latin America in 1942, now seems so perverted.

As you know, all the American Republics, to a greater or less degree, fall into the category of underdeveloped countries. All are dependent on the export of one, or at best a few, commodities to earn the foreign exchange to buy vital necessities and to finance economic development.

Any downswing in the world price or demand for their few exports plays havoc with their income. This uncertainty makes development planning exceedingly difficult.

With an average annual per capita income of less than $300, some areas in Latin America are hard pressed to maintain even this low living standard in the face of a rapidly growing population.

Our neighbors have not been sitting on their hands waiting for assistance. Ninety percent of the capital invested in the area is Latin America's own. The reserves accumulated from the sale of raw materials during World War II, made possible a spurt of development in the region. From 1945 to 1953 the average per capita income rose at the rate of 3.3 percent a year, and Mexico, for example, achieved a rate twice as great. After 1952, with reserves depleted and the price and demand for Latin America's principal products on the decline, the accelerated rate of development ground to a halt.

Responsible leaders in Latin America are worried. On the one hand they have populations awakened from centuries of apathy who are demanding a better deal in life. On the other hand, the ubiquitous Communists are there, dangling tempting promises before the eyes of the underprivileged. Democratic leaders in Latin America know that they must produce some tangible results, that they must provide some hope for a better future, if democratic government is to endure.

THE U.S. RESPONSE HAS BEEN AMBIGUOUS

On the question of Latin America's economic development the United States has presented an ambiguous picture. Latin Americans understood and welcomed Secretary Marshall's stirring declaration at Harvard University 12 years ago: "Our policy is directed not against any country or doctrine, but against hunger, poverty, desperation, and chaos." Hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos well described Latin American conditions. And, we encouraged the Latin Americans to look almost exclusively to us for assistance.

We then proceeded to provide billions in aid to Europe and Asia. To Latin American pleas for assistance, we replied with advice that they should look to private investments and private enterprise as the principal channel for their funds. In 1956 Senator SMATHERS proposed an amendment to the Mutual Security Act to provide a special fund for loans for Latin America for health, education and sanitation projects. This proposal met with resistance from the State Department on the grounds that private capital was doing a good enough job. I am happy to say that Congress passed the amendment in spite of State Department resistance.

The frequent reiteration that private capital would meet Latin American requirements insulted and irritated our neighbors. We Americans like our system of free enterprise. It has worked for us, although not in the simon-pure form that some people like to pretend. Latin Americans, on the other hand, have some sour memories of the robber-baron type investments, both domestic and foreign, which we ourselves have long since ceased to tolerate.

In addition to historical differences, the advice ignored the plain fact that private enterprise goes in to make a profit, and will hardly be attracted when the basic sinews of a national economy—such as roads, power and sanitation facilities—are lacking.

Moreover, overdependence on private investment results in a piecemeal approach to economic development as private funds haphazardly move into a mine here and a factory there. Latin Americans point out that in their urgent circumstances they cannot wait for the trickle-down theory to maybe work.

THE U.S. CHANGE OF HEART

It took the violent outbursts against Vice President NIXON to make us conscious of the gravity of the Latin American situation. On March 10 last the Department of State announced a change of heart, as follows:

"Not only must account be taken of the private capital and technical know-how required to create employment for those who today are underemployed or unemployed, but also of the need to create new jobs for an even larger number of workers. In addition to the expansion of industry and agriculture which this implies, very large additional amounts of public funds will be required for facilities which only governments can provide; for example, highways, sanitation facilities, hospitals, and schools."

The recognition that Latin American growing pains differ from ours and our consequent abandonment of inflexible doctrinaire principles should open the way for better inter-American understanding.

Along the new guidelines positive steps are in progress. The administration has finally announced that it will support an Inter-American Development Bank, something the Latin Americans have been urging for years and we have been resisting for years. We have agreed to consult with the Republics before making decisions which could affect their principal exports. We have indicated a willingness to take a fresh look at efforts to deal with instability and fluctuation in the commodity market. We have lent our support to the idea of regional markets within Latin America.

In short, we have recognized the magnitude of Latin America's problem and have agreed to cooperate with our neighbors in finding solutions.

A NINE-POINT PROGRAM FOR IMPROVING LATIN AMERICAN RELATIONS

Latin America, as population zooms, as industrial development spreads, and hope and impatience mingle, is going to be a cauldron of competing political ideologies. We should welcome this development, not fear it.

In no region of the world have we deeper historical traditions to build upon. It was with the Latin American Republics that we first developed the idea of regional cooperation. The bold idea of mutual cooperation to attack disease, illiteracy, and poverty was born within the inter-American family.

These are the people who wept unashamedly when Franklin Delano Roosevelt died.

Today in Latin America there are many leaders who understand and admire our democratic system and want to develop something comparable in their own countries. I know of an American who, while attending the inauguration last month of the democratically elected President of Venezuela, was asked on three separate occasions by newly elected Venezuelan congressmen how they could get hold of a copy of the "Jefferson Manual of Rules for the House of Representatives."

Our traditions of individual freedom and concern for ordinary human beings were once the cornerstone of our successful Latin American policy. Now, to Latin Americans, these much admired beliefs seem to stop at the border. While we caution our neighbors about Communist activities and Communist infiltration, we appear peculiarly cold toward the Latin American yearning to achieve genuine civil liberties.

The recent steps taken by the administration to repair our tottering Latin American policy should be applauded. They are steps in the right direction, but they will not be enough if the escalator of history is going faster in the opposite direction. We must replace our massive indifference to Latin American aspirations with massive cooperation.

The Latin American situation cries out for imaginative, long-range planning, rather than the hurried, patch-up measures after an explosion has occurred.

A coordinated program on the order of the Marshall plan would give the Latin Americans new hope of attaining bread and freedom. The possibilities of such an effort should be explored carefully, not primarily as an anti-Communist stratagem, but because it is good for Latin America and for the United States. We should not be ashamed of our humanitarian tradition. Nor should we be embarrassed if humanitarian and security objectives sometimes coincide in our national policy.

In conclusion, I should like to propose a nine-point program for improving United States-Latin American relations. I believe this program is realistic and workable and in harmony with the best interests of our country and of our 20 sister Republics.

First. The United States should increase the volume of its economic aid in support of Latin American efforts to develop diversified and viable economics so they will not be dependent, as they now are, on a few commodities. Requests for loans from the Development Loan Fund and the Export-Import Bank should be dealt with expeditiously and sympathetically. We should cooperate fully with the new Inter-American Development Institution. The proposed corps of technical experts within the institute could help the smaller, inexperienced countries draw up coordinated development plans.

Second. The United States should accelerate and strengthen its program of technical assistance in agriculture, health, education, vocational training, and public administration. The time has come to recapture the original fervor of President Truman's bold new program which was widely hailed in Latin America when it was first announced a decade ago.

Third. The United States should support vigorously the current moves within Latin America to establish regional markets. The elimination of inter-American trade barriers would broaden markets for Latin American products and make low-cost manufacturing feasible, both indispensable prerequisites to diversification and economic growth.

Fourth. The United States should review its trade and tariff policies as they affect imports from Latin America. It is self-defeating for us to provide economic assistance with one hand and take it away with the other by shortsighted trade restrictions. If policies designed to strengthen our trade with Latin America cause hardship to any domestic industry, the Government has a responsibility to aid those so affected. (I recently cosponsored an amendment in the Senate to the Area Redevelopment Act (S. 722) to make such aid possible, but unfortunately it did not pass the committee stage.)

Fifth. The United States should give wholehearted support to the health programs under the direction of the Pan American Sanitary Organization. Widespread disease which stalks Latin America is a tremendous economic drain as well as a human tragedy. Investment in health is perhaps the cheapest, most effective investment we can make in the future of the Western Hemisphere.

Sixth. The United States should develop a bold and imaginative program of student and cultural exchange.

We need to reexamine our methods of screening Latin American scholarship recipients. Too frequently the test has been the friendliness of the recipient toward the United States. Young Latin Americans of so-called leftist tendencies have been excluded, when they are often the very ones who would benefit most from the program.

Seventh. The U.S. press, radio, and TV, networks should give wider and better balanced news coverage of Latin American affairs. This, of course, is something our Government can do little about. But it is essential that the American people have a continuous report and interpretation of Latin American developments if they are to understand the magnitude of the problems in that region and what we are asked to support. When news of revolutions and executions dominate our newspapers, it is hard for the American taxpayer to form an understanding of the underlying realities in the 20 American Republics, and of our interest in them.

Eighth. The United States should thoroughly reappraise its military assistance program in Latin America. What we have given one nation for hemispheric defense has often provoked demands by another for an equal amount of aid. Great care should be taken not to encourage this type of arms race, which Latin American governments can ill-afford. We should give greater attention to the coordination of military policy and strategy in the hemisphere. This might well result in a decrease in the requirements of national military establishments.

Further, our military assistance to certain dictatorial governments has raised the question of whose freedom those governments are defending. The use by Batista of U.S. supplied armaments against his own people, contrary to stipulations of our defense treaty, has greatly damaged U.S. prestige throughout Latin America. It makes little sense to speak of hemisphere defense while arming a tyrant who uses weapons to intimidate his own people.

Ninth. The United States should lend its support to the idea of regional arms control. Last year Costa Rica submitted such a plan to the Organization of American States and received nominal support from the U.S. delegation. Our Government should now press for the consideration of the Costa Rican plan or some similar project, at the eleventh inter-American Conference to be held at Quito next year.

The quality of our overall policy toward Latin America will be determined not only by what we do, but by how we do it.

Unless we pursue our policies with a genuine interest in the welfare of our fellow human beings, they will do little to heal our wounded inter-American relations. The steps already taken by the Department of State, many of them complete reversals of former policy, will avail us little if they are done reluctantly and only under Latin American pressure.

We must, if we are to recapture the warm bonds of friendship which characterized the best days of the good-neighbor policy, breathe into inter-American cooperation that intangible spirit which then characterized our relations—a deep-rooted conviction that the Western Hemisphere can, indeed it must, be a New World where freedom and opportunity flourish.

Statement Upon Introduction of Legislation Proposing Constitutional Amendment To Assure the States Exclusive Control Over the Public Schools

OF
HON. KENNETH A. ROBERTS
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 14, 1959

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, in a bill which I am introducing today, I am proposing an amendment to the Constitution which shall be valid upon ratification by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. This amendment reads:

> Administrative control of any public school, public educational institution, or public educational system operated by any State or by any political or other subdivision thereof, shall be vested exclusively in such State and subdivision and nothing contained in this Constitution shall be construed to deny to the residents thereof the right to determine for themselves the manner in which any such school, institution, or system is administered by such State and subdivision.

The distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] previously has introduced similar legislation.

Mr. Speaker, when the Supreme Court in its 1954 desegregation decision decreed that the separate but equal principle in providing public education was unconstitutional, there was set in motion pressure which has caused turmoil in the South and in other sections of this country.

Since this unprecedented decision was handed down, we have seen radical elements flourish, schools destroyed by explosives, Federal troops with bayonets invading a campus, and public school buildings shut down. Today, nearly 5 years later, the issue is more irreconcilable than ever. The problem remains, and it is time a solution is found.

In my estimation, the solution can be approached only when a sound constitutional foundation is laid. This is what the amendment which I propose seeks to provide.

For some time, I have insisted that education is and ought to be under exclusive control of State and local authorities. There should be no room under our Constitution for the Federal Government to usurp this authority, and that is what happened in the 1954 integration decree.

History warns us of the usurpation of powers by the judiciary. George Washington in his Farewell Address stated:

Let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.

In 1956, a special committee of outstanding jurists appointed by the Governor of Florida made a thorough study of public-school education in the light of the Supreme Court decisions. The committee pointed out that the assumption of power to change the meaning of the Constitution such as evidenced by the Supreme Court's integration decrees is an abuse of public trust and a tyrannical usurpation of power. The committee pointed out:

The Constitution of the United States may be amended only in the manner provided in that Constitution. In the course of history since the adoption of the Constitution the people have 21 times found it expedient to amend the Constitution, and when that unanimity of public opinion which justifies a change in the Constitution has developed among the people they have found no difficulty in effecting the changes they found desirable.

In my estimation, Mr. Speaker, the time has come and the people are ready for a constitutional amendment to assure each State the right to determine how it will conduct its public-school system.

David Lawrence, noted and respected syndicated columnist and publisher, recently in his column pointed to what seems to me to be the growing unworkability of integration in the schools. He indicates that the issue may reach the status of prohibition and its repeal, where the collateral effects of the controversy made it clear that each State should have the right to control its own liquor traffic. Mr. Lawrence concludes:

So with respect to school integration—as already revealed in the big cities of the North, including voteless Washington—the emergence of emotional issues having little to do with the merits of education or equality of status of individuals may finally decide the controversy in the next decade. It could bring a wave of feeling that local option—the right of each State to handle its own educational problems—is again the answer to a question of sociology as raised by the Supreme Court.

These emotional side-effects, which are already splitting this Nation, should not be allowed to grow. Let us take the problem out of the hands of a judicial oligarchy and place it back in the hands of the people concerned. The people can and will solve this problem to their own satisfaction if given the opportunity. An amendment to the Constitution, such as I propose, would, I sincerely believe, give them that opportunity.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 15, 1959

Rev. William C. Martin, bishop of the Dallas-Fort Worth area of the Methodist Church, offered the following prayer:

Almighty and Eternal God, our Heavenly Father, Thou who art the source of all truth and of all righteousness, we give Thee grateful thanks for the abundance of Thy mercies by which our Nation was brought to birth and by which it has been guided and guarded and sustained, even unto this day. Grant, we beseech Thee, to Thy servants, the President and the Members of the Senate, such a full measure of Thy wisdom that they may be able to interpret, wisely and faithfully, Thy will for the people whom they represent and for this Nation and the nations of the world. And may the decisions which they make this day and every day be so fully in accord with the principles of justice and freedom that the people will be guided aright and the peace and welfare of the world advanced, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

RESIGNATION OF SECRETARY OF STATE DULLES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, my heart is heavy and I am saddened by the news that circumstances over which he had no control made it necessary for the distinguished Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, to submit his resignation this morning. Every American will regret his resignation and the circumstances which led him to submit it.

Everyone who knows John Foster Dulles is impressed with his deep dedication to duty; and all of us who know him intimately know that this decision is one which he did not make lightly, but only because he thought it would serve the best interests of the Nation and the free world.

Secretary Dulles will remain in our hearts as a great American who faced difficult and trying tasks with fortitude and with resolution.

On many occasions I have had the opportunity to visit with him, either in his office or in his home, to discuss problems which affected our country. We did not always agree on the solutions proposed or on the methods by which the Government was proceeding; but we could always disagree without being disagreeable.

Mr. President, I have only the highest respect, the greatest admiration, and the deepest personal affection for this dedicated man who has served his country long and well, and always has served it fearlessly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, it is an interesting commentary on mankind that character, after all, will have its way. Disagree though we as a country may with our officials, yet in an hour of crisis and challenge people respect character.

It is notable that approbation and praise of the service of John Foster Dulles should have been manifested so widely and so intensely in every walk of life and in every section of the country.

John Foster Dulles is a great Christian. He has sensed the great surges and the great movements in history toward the nobler ideals of mankind.

John Foster Dulles is a great philosopher, with an amazing sense of humor and an imperturbability which are so necessary in the diplomatic field.

We know John Foster Dulles as a great lawyer in whose book only the facts must count.

So it is with a sense of dismay that we receive the message of his resignation. It will come as a shock to the Nation. We shall miss his counsel and we shall miss his guiding hand as he carried on his dedicated efforts, in behalf of his fellow countrymen, toward the golden goal of human peace.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, there are times when words will not say what we mean. At best, they can only suggest what we feel. This is one of those times.

The resignation of John Foster Dulles, the Secretary of State, does not come as a shock, for we have sensed for weeks, as he must have known for even longer, that this day might come. There are physical limits which apply even to the strongest spirit. There is a point beyond which even the most dedicated heart and mind can no longer sustain the drag of the body.

We knew this day might come. We did not know when it would come. That question has now been answered.

For me, Mr. President, it is a day of inexpressible sadness. I feel the resignation of Mr. Dulles as a personal loss, for I have known him as a very human man. I have sensed his innate touch of humanity even in the impersonal world of international relations in which his work confined him.

I feel his resignation, too, as a public loss. There will be time enough to talk of his many achievements on behalf of the Nation. At this moment, we can only face the fact that he will be unable to continue his unselfish labors on behalf of all of us, on behalf of the peace and the freedom of mankind.

Even in the throes of grave illness, however, John Foster Dulles has something to give to the Nation. I speak now not of what he may still be able to contribute in the way of advice on foreign policy. He will provide that, to be sure. I speak, rather, of another gift which he gives, a gift infinitely more precious. He gives to us—to the President, to Members of Congress, to all who hold public trust—the example of his pure spirit of dedication to the Nation, his steadfastness in the face of adversity, his invincible courage and determination in the pursuit of the just as it was given to him to see the just. If we have but the sense to recognize this gift, the humility to take it, and the will to act on it, we shall move through the difficult days ahead toward a just and enduring peace.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it was with deep sorrow that I learned this morning that Secretary of State Dulles had submitted his resignation. Along with many others, I had hoped, up until the time he made this decision, that somehow he would regain sufficient strength to enable him to continue discharging his responsibilities as Secretary of State.

I have a deep personal feeling in this matter. In December of 1952, Mr. Dulles asked me if I would go to work for him after he assumed his duties as Secretary of State in January 1953; and this I did. I served with that great man for 3 years and 2 months.

I had always respected him and admired him for his courage, his great devotion to duty, and his profound understanding of the problems of this troubled world. During my association with him I came to love him.

I hope and pray that sufficient strength will be restored to him so that he will be able to bring to bear his intellect, his force, and his understanding on the problems which face our Nation today. He knows that he has all my good wishes and my prayers.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my distinguished colleague from Kentucky. The resignation of Mr. Dulles is a sad occasion for all of us who have been hoping and praying that his health would improve sufficiently to enable him to remain at the post which he has so well filled.

His wise counsel is sorely needed in these critical times. We can only hope that relief from the burdens of the task which he has been performing so magnificently may help to improve his condition, and that he will yet be restored to full health and vigor.

His counsel will continue to be exceedingly important, and it is extremely important that he be available to his successor for aid, counsel, and encouragement in the serious and critical tasks which our Secretary of State will face in these times.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the resignation today of John Foster Dulles as Secretary of State represents, in my humble judgment, a tremendous loss to our country and to the free world.

Rarely in history has a man in public life served the country he loved with more distinction, ability, and dedication.

As Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles carried on his duties tirelessly and relentlessly. On an around-the-clock, around-the-globe schedule, he gave a measureless amount of energy and devotion to his difficult and challenging task.

During more than 50 years of service to his country in a variety of important posts, and particularly as Secretary of State, he has exhibited the kind of integrity and statesmanship which not only his friends have praised, but also his critics in this country and enemies of our Nation abroad have respected.

Today, I, like millions of others in America share the President's sorrow at the necessity of Mr. Dulles' resignation.

As he relinquishes his duties, our country now can, and will, I believe, express gratitude to him for a lifetime of worthy service and for a job well done.

We prayerfully hope for his full recovery from his illness, so that he may enjoy many brighter years ahead.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I wish to join my colleagues on both sides of the aisle who have expressed their sentiments and those of the people of our country, and, I think I can truthfully say, the sentiments of the people of the free world, in the sad and sorrowful situation which has required the Secretary of State of our country to resign.

John Foster Dulles has been a tower of strength for those people all around the globe who believe in freedom. He has been unflinching and unswerving in his devotion to this cause in the face of incessant Communist taunts and threats, intrigue and intransigence.

We pray that Mr. Dulles may be spared for the future so that his own wisdom may be available to the Government of our country as it continues hopefully to find a way to peace.

I join other Members of this body in thanking John Foster Dulles for his many years of dedicated service to America and to the cause of a just peace. We wish for him—indeed, pray for him—recovery from the malignancy which unhappily has been visited upon him.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the statement which I issued to the press on April 15 when I learned that John Foster Dulles had resigned as our Secretary of State, because of the critical nature of his illness.

I join with others in the Senate in wishing for Mr. Dulles all possible recovery from the serious disease which plagues him. His dedication to duty has stirred the admiration of freedom-loving people all over the world.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, OF OREGON

All Americans must sympathize with the gallant fight of Secretary Dulles against a grim disease. More than ever, I think we appreciate the dedication and self-sacrifice with which Mr. Dulles has approached his task as our Secretary of State for so many years.

At the time cancer was first diagnosed, it may have been that Secretary Dulles should have undergone some of the treatments which he since has received, more than 2 years later. However, his devotion to duty carried him back to his work at an early date. This is one more indication that his countrymen are in his debt.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 336, making a supplemental appropriation of $40 million for unemployment compensation for veterans and Federal employees. This resolution passed the House of Representatives yesterday. The second supplemental appropriation bill, which presently is before the Appropriations Committee, contains an appropriation of $40 million for this purpose. The second supplemental appropriation bill, however, will not be enacted into law in sufficient time for payments which are due to be made to veterans and Federal employees. This emergency measure will make the funds available; and any amount used under it will be charged against the amount contained in the second supplemental appropriation bill when it is enacted into law.

When the joint resolution passed the House yesterday, the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee—as shown on page 5819 of the RECORD—had inserted in the RECORD a letter, from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, pointing out the urgency in connection with this matter.

I was directed by the Appropriations Committee to present this matter to the Senate as soon as possible after the joint resolution arrived from the House.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I understand that there is agreement on this matter, that the item was taken out of the other bill in the interest of expeditious action, that it was sent to Congress by the Bureau of the Budget, and that it has been passed by the House of Representatives, and has the approval of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Certainly we have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 336) making a supplemental appropriation for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year 1959, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sum is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, namely:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

BUREAU OF EMPLOYMENT SECURITY

Unemployment compensation for veterans and Federal employees

For an additional amount for "Unemployment compensation for veterans and Federal employees", $40,000,000: Provided, That obligations incurred and expenditures made pursuant to this joint resolution shall be charged to the appropriation under this heading in the Second Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1959 (H.R. 5916), whenever such Act containing such appropriation is enacted into law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 336) was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 68

"Whereas Capt. William Driver, a retired American sea captain, born in Salem, Mass., March 17, 1803, died in Nashville, Tenn., March 3, 1886, who gave the name Old Glory to our American flag, a name revered by all patriotic Americans, now lies buried in the city cemetery at Nashville; and

"Whereas his grave is a shrine visited by many tourists and native Tennesseans; and

"Whereas the Nashville City Cemetery Commission has granted post 5 of the American Legion permission to erect a flag pole at this grave, which pole will be spotlighted at night; and

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the 81st General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, the Senate concurring, That it does memorialize the Congress of the United States to grant permission to the city of Nashville to fly the American flag over the grave of Capt. MCCLELLAN, CHAIRMAN, SENATE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS; THE HONORABLE E. L. BARTLETT AND THE HONORABLE ERNEST GRUENING, SENATORS FROM ALASKA; THE HONORABLE RALPH J. RIVERS, REPRESENTATIVE FROM ALASKA:

"Your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Alaska in first legislature, first session assembled respectfully submits that—

"Whereas, legislation has been introduced into the United States Senate known as the Payments to Local Government Act of 1959; and

"Whereas this bill represents the culmination of nearly 10 years of continuous legislative effort to develop a program which would afford some measure of relief to local communities which have suffered losses as a result of the presence of Federal tax immune properties within their jurisdictions; and

"Whereas at the same time the bill does not do violence to the principle of Federal tax immunity, establishing as it does a nonpartisan board to administer a temporary 5-year program of payments in lieu of taxes and special assessments on a limited category of real property which has been removed from the local tax rolls as a result of Federal acquisition; and

"Whereas the bill does not introduce any sort of a Federal giveaway program, but rather allows only for payment in carefully weighed cases of legitimate local government hardship arising from Federal tax-free properties; and

"Whereas representative and responsible local government groups throughout the United States, including the Council of State Governments, the American Municipal Association and the National Association of County Officials have publicly supported this legislation; and

"Whereas the passage of such legislation would be of direct benefit to local jurisdictions in Alaska where Federal holdings are numerous;

"Now, therefore, your memorialist urges that Senate bill 910 of the 86th Congress, 1st session, be passed by both Houses of Congress in the near future.

"Whereas the establishment of guided missile range in the Territory of Hawaii will serve to publicize and emphasize the importance of our islands to our country and to the free world; and

"Whereas there is an abundance of idle land on the island of Hawaii, Kauai, and Maui, which appear to be ideally suited for the establishment of a guided missile range; and

"Whereas the establishment of a guided missile range in the Territory of Hawaii will lessen the inconvenience and expenses incidental to displaying the operation of guided missiles and guided missile ranges to invited observers from friendly countries of the Far East; Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the U.S. Departments of Defense, Interior, and State, Central Intelligence Agency, and Federal Bureau of Investigation be and they are hereby respectfully requested to investigate the feasibility, wisdom, and safety (both to the national security and to the persons and property in the Territory of Hawaii) of establishing a guided missile range on the island of Hawaii, Kauai, and Maui; and be it further

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Alaska; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL 22

"To the HONORABLE DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; THE HONORABLE RICHARD NIXON, PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE; THE HONORABLE SAM RAYBURN, SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES; THE HONORABLE E. L. "Your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Alaska in first legislature, first session assembled, respectfully submits that:

"Whereas Public Law 85-739 as passed in August 1958, allows certain small vessels to transport merchandise to and from places within the inland waters of southeastern Alaska and Prince Rupert, British Columbia; and

"Whereas the vessels authorized by this law are operated by cooperatives and transport the merchandise of members on a nonprofit basis; and

"Whereas the large, scheduled vessels serving southeastern Alaska cannot economically and expeditiously provide service between small fishing villages and the larger commercial and processing centers of southeastern Alaska; and

"Whereas considering the numerous and diverse waterways of southeastern Alaska and the dependence of the area on the fishing industry it can be seen that the operation of such small vessels is essential to the total economy of that part of the State; and

"Whereas the present Federal law authorizes the use of such small vessels only until March 15, 1960; and

"Whereas this time limitation leaves the operators of such vessels in doubt as to the status of their activities, and has a depressive effect on that part of the Alaskan economy that is dependent on inexpensive and effective transportation between the inland ports:

"Now, therefore, your memorialist urges that all necessary action be taken to encourage, pass, and approve Federal legislation to extend the limits of Public Law 85-739 for 4 years beyond March 15, 1960.

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"RESOLUTION 89

"Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to provide for the utilization of Camp Drum in Jefferson County on a year-round basis

"Whereas in recent years the facilities of the U.S. Army installation known as Camp Drum in Jefferson County in New York State, have been utilized only during certain months of each year; and

"Whereas the commanding general of the First Army and the commanding general of the Continental Army of the United States have recommended that training troops should be stationed at Camp Drum during the entire year; and

"Whereas the above-mentioned commanding generals as well as many other army officers who are familiar with the situation have stated that the above stationing of troops at Camp Drum would not only be beneficial to the morale of the officers and troops who are trained there but would also improve their training and efficiency; and

"Whereas, the carrying out of such recommendation would eliminate much shifting and transportation of troops and would not involve any increased expenditure of funds: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved (if the Senate concur), That the Congress of the United States be and it hereby is respectfully memorialized to take such action as may be necessary to provide that the above-mentioned Camp Drum shall be utilized and kept in operation during the entire year; and be it further

"Resolved (if the Senate concur), That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and the Secretary of the Army and to each Member of Congress duly elected from the State of New York."

JOINT RESOLUTION OF OREGON LEGISLATURE

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the 50th Assembly of the Oregon Legislature has adopted a joint memorial to Congress supporting appropriations needed to complete Operation Outdoors on schedule during the coming fiscal year. So that the Senate will know of the support among Oregon State legislators for improving recreational facilities in the national forest, I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, the text of senate joint memorial 3.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL 3

To His Excellency, the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, and to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the 50th Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent as follows:

Whereas the economy of the State of Oregon is largely based on timber and recreation; and

Whereas the national forests of the United States contain the key timber supply and recreational resources within the State of Oregon; and

Whereas the economy and welfare of the State of Oregon are therefore dependent upon the quality of the management of the national forests; and

Whereas sound management of the national forests requires adequate financing; and

Whereas at hearings conducted by the Subcommittee on Public Roads of the Committee on Public Works of the United States Senate in December 1957, in Oregon, and at other points throughout the Western States, Members of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives, authorized officers of the U.S. Forest Service, representatives of State and local governments and knowledgeable citizens of the Western States unanimously agreed that proper management of the national forests for the most effective and efficient development of their recreational and timber resources requires the exhilarated development of a permanent access road system within such national forests; and

Whereas the budget presented by the executive branch of Congress for its consideration requires appropriations for this purpose that are substantially below the sum that only 1 year ago Congress authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1959; and

Whereas the said budget requires an appropriation of only $8,500,000 to finance Operation Outdoors, the 5-year plan announced by the U.S. Department of Agriculture for modernizing and expanding recreational facilities in the national forests to meet the heavily increasing use made of the national forests by our citizens for recreation; and

Whereas such plans for successful completion of Operation Outdoors specifically contemplated that an appropriation of $19,500,000 would be required for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1959: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon, the House of Representatives jointly concurring therein, That the Congress of the United States is hereby urged to appropriate for the construction of access roads in the national forests during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1959, the full amount of $30 million that is authorized therefor by law; be it further

Resolved, That the Congress appropriate for Operation Outdoors the full amount of $19,500,000 previously agreed upon as a necessary expenditure during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1959; be it further

Resolved, That the Oregon Members of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives be asked to promote and support such appropriations; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States; to the President and the Chief Clerk of the U.S. Senate; to the Speaker and the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States; and to all members of the Oregon congressional delegation.

RESOLUTION OF THE NEW YORK LEGISLATURE

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, a concurrent resolution adopted by the New York State Legislature, memorializing Congress to provide for the utilization of Camp Drum in Jefferson County, N.Y., on a year round basis.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Armed Services and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION 89

Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to provide for the utilization of Camp Drum in Jefferson County on a year round basis

Whereas the above mentioned commanding generals as well as many other Army officers who are familiar with the situation have stated that the above stationing of troops at Camp Drum would not only be beneficial to the morale of the officers and troops who are trained there but would also improve their training and efficiency; and

Whereas the carrying out of such recommendation would eliminate much shifting and transportation of troops and would not involve any increased expenditure of funds: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Congress of the United States be and it hereby is respectfully memorialized to take such action as may be necessary to provide that the above mentioned Camp Drum shall be utilized and kept in operation during the entire year; and be it further

Resolved (if the senate concur), That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and the Secretary of the Army, and to each Member of Congress duly elected from the State of New York.

RESOLUTION OF THE INDIANAPOLIS BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, a resolution adopted by the Indianapolis Bar Association, endorsing S. 1567 and praying for its passage by the Congress.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION BY THE INDIANAPOLIS BAR ASSOCIATION

Whereas the Honorable KENNETH B. KEATING, U.S. Senator from the State of New York, has introduced S. 1567, which provides that attorneys at law admitted to practice before the highest court of their State or Territory shall not henceforth be required to obtain special admission to practice before any agency, board, bureau, commission, or department of the Federal Government, except the U.S. Patent Office; and

Whereas many attorneys at law have been faced with what we believe to be unnecessary delay and annoyance in procuring such additional admissions, and that said proposal by Senator KEATING is worthy and meritorious: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Indianapolis Bar Association, That S. 1567 be, and the same is hereby, endorsed and the Congress of the United States is hereby petitioned to pass such proposed legislation.

RESOLUTION OF ST. PAUL, MINN., AFL–CIO TRADES AND LABOR ASSEMBLY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a resolution adopted on April 8, 1959, by the St. Paul AFL–CIO Trades and Labor Assembly in support of legislation, H.R. 3547 and S. 791, to set certain Federal standards in connection with the State unemployment compensation programs, be inserted in the RECORD. I am proud to be a cosponsor of this legislation which is sorely needed in order to provide adequate benefit payments to our country's unemployed workers.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas unemployment in our area is a serious situation at the present time and all indications are that it will remain at a critical level in the predictable future; and

Whereas the Minnesota State Senate has shown that it will not improve the wholly inadequate Unemployment Compensation Act that is presently in effect; and

Whereas there are many hundreds of families in our area who are suffering needless hardships because of the failure of the legislature to live up to the intent of the Minnesota Unemployment Compensation Act by amending it to keep up with present-day economic conditions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the St. Paul AFL–CIO Trades and Labor Assembly in behalf of its 60,000 members go on record for full support of H.R. 3547 and S. 791, a bill to set permanent Federal standards guaranteeing benefits of at least 50 percent of a worker's average weekly wage, up to a maximum of two-thirds of the State's average weekly wage, benefits payable for a 39-week period; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Congressman JOSEPH E. KARTH and Senators HUBERT H. HUMPHREY and EUGENE J. MCCARTHY, urging them to use every effort to secure passage of this urgently needed legislation.

JOINT RESOLUTION OF OREGON LEGISLATURE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, Enrolled House Joint Memorial 5 adopted by the House of Representatives and the Senate of the State of Oregon, urging Federal appropriations to facilitate planning for the passage of fish and planning for hydroelectric dams in the rivers of the Pacific Northwest.

It gives me special pleasure to bring this particular resolution to the attention of my colleagues because it makes it clear that the Oregon Legislature strongly supports our efforts to bring about full development of our great river resources of the Pacific Northwest at the earliest possible date.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL 5

TO HIS EXCELLENCY, THE HONORABLE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

We, your memorialists, the 50th Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent as follows:

Whereas there is growing need in the Pacific Northwest for answers to the critical problems surrounding the passage of anadromous fish, particularly salmon and steelhead, at hydroelectric dams; and

Whereas failure to adequately finance fishery research is causing delay in the planning of dams which will be needed within a few years in the interest of national defense and economic expansion: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the Senate jointly concurring therein), That we urge the President of the United States to review the situation with the hope that additional Federal appropriations may be made available through the Department of Defense or the Department of the Interior so that planning for both fish and dams may proceed in an orderly fashion; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States, all members of the Oregon congressional delegation, and the legislative assemblies of the States of Washington, California, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Nevada, and Wyoming.

REACTIVATION OF THE CASTLE POINT VETERANS HOSPITAL, NEW YORK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of Dutchess County Council, State of New York, favoring the reactivation of the Castle Point Veterans Hospital.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That since the Chief Medical and Surgical Department of the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D.C., does not feel that they want to recommend to the Veterans' Administration, Administrators favorable, to reactivate Castle Point Veterans Hospital, to its full capacity for general medical and surgical hospital; be it further

Resolved, That since a conference with Dr. William S. Middleton, held at Castle Point Hospital on Thursday, April 9, 1959, facts have been presented to him by various leaders of the veteran organizations, civic, fraternal, chamber of commerce, city of Beacon, N.Y., officials, and Dutchess County Board of Supervisors officials, and other officials, including the Dutchess County veterans agency, and New York State veterans affairs counsellors, without any immediate results to the reactivation of the Castle Point Veterans Hospital, a copy of recommendations made to him attached, as part of this resolution; be it further

Resolved, That since there is a waiting list of such cases in the Albany Veterans Hospital of 121, as of April 9, 1959, New York City Hospital of 80, Castle Point Veterans Hospital of 3, a total of 204 patients waiting for hospitalization, also there are a number of admitted cases at these hospitals that are not included in this waiting list, however patients must wait for beds from 1 to 3 weeks, in which case the waiting list is much larger than appears on the record; be it further

Resolved, That there is now a 1,800 waiting list of NP cases at Montrose Veterans Hospital, and at Northport VA Hospital with a bed load capacity of 1,000, as of April 9, 1959, there has been a bed load of 2,300, or overcrowding of NP cases by 1,300; be it further

Resolved, That there are at present NP cases at the Montrose and Northport Veterans Hospital, with minimum NP sickness, although these same NP cases in need of more general medical treatment, than NP treatment, which could be treated at the Castle Point VA Hospital; be it further

Resolved, That the remodernization with the three empty buildings at Castle Point VA Hospital, could be accomplished with a minimum of $500,000 and a maximum of $750,000; be it further

Resolved, That this Castle Point VA Hospital could immediately accept and treat general medical and surgical cases up to a total of 350 bed patients with the TB cases, if approval came from the Veterans' Administration; be it further

Resolved, That as an economical measure, the cost per diem per patient would decrease, if reactivated to its full capacity, concurred to by Dr. William S. Middleton; be it further

Resolved, That there has been an authorization made by the President, and Congress, to the Veterans' Administration, of remodernization of Castle Point VA Hospital on September 1957, in the amount of $3 million and as of July 1, 1958, the recommendation for the remodernization program for Castle Point VA Hospital still in existence, when a few months later a cutback of 40 TB beds, and 10 general medical and surgical cases, or a total of 50 beds was ordered to take effect as of July 1, 1959, with an additional 50 beds on July 1, 1960; be it further

Resolved, That the Chief Medical and Surgical Department had recommended to the Veterans' Administration, the approval of the remodernization of the Castle Point VA Hospital, in the amount of $3,100,000 on September 1957, and July 1, 1958, however only a few months later ordered the cutback, and do not find it fit to recommend the reconversion to general medical and surgical treatments; be it further

Resolved, That the cost of the remodernization program including the remodernization of the three empty buildings at this VA Hospital, to its full bed capacity of 600 bed patients, would cost, and could be remodernized for 25 percent of the original appropriation, thus saving of $2,500,000 of the original appropriation, and could be reactivated to its full capacity with a little increase of additional personnel; however, the per diem, per patient would cost less; be it further

Resolved, That there are 20 counties in the Albany VA hospital area, or approximately a little more than one-third of the New York State Counties, handling general medical and surgical cases, and which includes 6 counties which want their patients to go to Castle Point VA Hospital, and are forced to be admitted, due to the fact, that Castle Point VA hospital has been known as a TB hospital; be it further

Resolved, That patients from Rockland, Sullivan, and the most populated area (Westchester County) must be sent to New York City VA Hospital, same condition as Albany VA Hospital; be it further

Resolved, That since the Veterans' Administration did not make known, to the general public, and mostly to the counties involved, that the general medical and surgical cases could be referred to Castle Point VA Hospital, the Veterans' Administration is fully responsible for the small waiting list at Castle Point VA hospital, as very few organizations, their service officers, their rehabilitation officers, were only sending TB cases to Castle Point VA Hospital; be it further

Resolved, That these nine counties have over 200,000 veterans, in a fast-growing area, with the International Machines Corp. being constructed and added to this community, in the city of Poughkeepsie, and Kingston, N.Y., with a personnel of 17,000, approximately, also 3 large new Satte institutions built only recently with added personnel, thus increasing the veteran population, where only a few miles away a new 800-unit housing development will begin, practically behind the hospital; be it further

Resolved, That since there are over 300 patients at Mount McGregor Hospital, which is being kept active by New York State to rehabilitate veterans after they are discharged from veterans hospital, and several times, the New York State was to closed this rehabilitation center, and which also is this year being considered by the New York State, there is a very serious problem, in this area, the southeastern part of New York State, as there are right now 504 veterans sick, needy, and afflicted, besides those admitted to the veterans hospital in Albany, and New York VA hospital, which are not considered a waiting list, but who are awaiting to enter the hospital, but must wait 1 to 3 weeks; be it further

Resolved, That the transportation problem of coming to and from Castle Point VA Hospital, is much more economical, easy access, to the members of the family of the needy, sick, and afflicted veteran, and it has been conceded by Dr. William S. Middleton, that more frequent visits from the family helps greatly to restore the health much more sooner to such a veteran; be it further

Resolved, That since Dr. William S. Middleton, has taken a stand, that the 504 waiting list in this area, plus the admitted cases, is not alarming to him, however this is a very serious situation in this area, and since it does involve the counties of Greene, Ulster, Orange, Delaware, Rockland, Sullivan, Dutchess, Putnam (most populated area), Westchester, and northern Bronx, or the largest population or populated area in the United States, which also means, the largest taxpaying population in the United States; be it further

Resolved, That a recommendation has been submitted to Dr. William S. Middleton, to authorize the use of the hospital for the following type of medical care and a general hospital, at the Castle Point, VA Hospital:

(a) When TB bed load drops that the increase and bed conversion to other type of medical and mental cases be authorized,

(b) That the six wards to be used for TB-general medical-surgical type patients—using wings "D" and "E",

(c) Tnree buildings, now empty to be used to: (1) Help alleviate overload at Northport Veterans Hospital with long-term nondangerous cases; (2) to help out large waiting list at Montrose VA Hospital with same type of patients; (3) that the biggest problem in Veterans Administration is the old aging veteran requiring longer periods of medical care and rehabilitation—that consideration be given to institute an all-out study type program for these veterans using these existing buildings; be it further

Resolved, That there will be an increase of veteran patients as these veterans grow older; be it further

Resolved, That since warehousing of mentally sick veterans is not encouraged, however there are many of the so-called mentally sick, that need minimum of treatment for such illness, but do not require medical and surgical treatment, therefore such patients could be treated at the Castle Point Hospital: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That proper legislation be introduced by the Congress of the United States in the House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate, and made into law, to reactivate Castle Point VA Hospital to its full capacity of 600 beds, with proper number of hospital personnel, staff, also that proper appropriation be made for the increase of personnel, patients and staff for the increase of bed patients, also an appropriation to remodernize the hospital and also the three empty hospital buildings, which will amount to $750,000, so that full reactivation of this hospital be made immediately.

RESCISSION OF QUOTAS ON OIL IMPORTS

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, a Presidential proclamation, issued March 10, has clamped tight restrictions on imports of crude oil and its principal products into the United States. The President's order can only have the most damaging consequences for the consumers and the industries of New Hampshire, New England, and most of the eastern seaboard.

The New England Senators, individually and collectively, had urged the President not to take this action. We warned him that such restrictions would adversely affect New England's industrial growth, its competitive economic position, and the welfare of its citizens. My own appeal against the mandatory import cutbacks called attention to the fact that it could result in shortages, or price increases which would have far-reaching effects.

Some of our worst fears were confirmed recently during the Easter recess of the Congress, when the specific quotas on residual oil imports were announced. The quota was set at 347,311 barrels a day for the next 3 months. This is a cutback of more than 27 percent when compared to average daily imports of 476,000 barrels in 1957 and 1958.

A reduction of this magnitude will almost inevitably have the most serious results, especially for New England and the east coast, which uses 50 percent of the residual oil consumed in the Nation. Those of us who were gravely concerned about the impact of a possible 10- or 15-percent cutback are now being hit by a 27-percent slash in these vital imports.

The adverse effects of the President's proclamation were spelled out to the Senate by the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] in clear and unmistakable terms. They are worth reemphasizing.

The restrictions on oil imports are:

First. Discriminatory to a populous region of the United States which has no natural fuel supplies.

Second. A major contribution to inflation.

Third. Conducive to unemployment.

Fourth. Harmful to our good relations with other oil producing countries.

Furthermore, the quotas:

First. Will place U.S. industry at a further competitive disadvantage in the world markets.

Second. Will weaken our national security.

Third. Will contribute to the growing domination of Government bureaucracy over our citizens and our industries.

Our concern about the consequences of the President's order is only reinforced by the recent announcement of the detailed quotas.

New England Senators and others have vainly implored the President to reconsider and revoke his order.

The only means of protest now left open to us is the outright step of proposing that Congress rescind the proclamation. I believe the facts fully warrant our use of this remedy, the last at our disposal. They fully justify the enactment of such legislation.

Therefore, Mr. President, for myself, and Senators AIKEN, BRIDGES, DODD, GREEN, PASTORE, PROUTY, and Mrs. SMITH, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to rescind the President's proclamation on oil import quotas.

The bill simply rescinds the action taken by the President in his proclamation of March 10 and provides against the issuance of other Executive orders with respect to petroleum or petroleum products without the prior approval of the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1672) to rescind the action of the President imposing quotas on petroleum and petroleum products, introduced by Mr. COTTON (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

COMPULSORY BIDDING FOR CERTAIN OIL OR GAS LEASES

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill the purpose of which is to make it mandatory that the Federal Government in leasing its oil and gas rights shall do so on a competitive bid basis.

It is estimated that we are losing at least $20 million annually as a result of our present policy of leasing these lands on a fixed-rate fee.

Under the existing law, the Federal Government has a standing rule of leasing the mineral rights on public lands at a fixed price of 50 cents per acre with an exception being made only in those areas in which there is known to be mineral rights.

All public lands are leased at these rates unless they are lands upon which oil deposits have been proven. On proven grounds, they can sell or negotiate leases at higher rates.

The catch is that the lands are not proven for oil deposits until after they have been leased. Therefore, the net effect of the existing law is that in areas in which the Government land is surrounded by proven oil deposits and at times when such surrounding lands are actually bringing premiums of as high as 20 to 30 dollars per acre for the leasing rates, the Government will lease its land which is just as valuable for the standard 50 cents per acre.

One glaring example of how the Government lost under this noncompetitive bid operation is best illustrated by what happened in New Mexico. An area of approximately 40,000 acres near Carlsbad, N. Mex., was withdrawn by the Secretary from oil or gas leasing on February 6, 1939, because of the potash developments in that area.

Many requests for leases to open the area for oil and gas development were received. Oil and gas had been found in large quantities in the immediate surrounding area. With modern technique for drilling, it was believed that it would be possible to drill for oil and gas without serious risk to the potash development.

Accordingly, the area was opened for oil and gas leasing with nearly all of this area being open on a noncompetitive basis inasmuch as it had not been actually proven to be a producing area for either oil or gas.

This 40,000 acres was broken up into about 79 tracts, and immediately nearly 29,000 applications were received from various interested parties, seeking to lease these tracts at the standard 50 cents per acre. The demand was so great that the Federal Government announced and arranged a public drawing whereby on a given date all the applications were placed in a pot and the lucky 79 drawn.

Through this noncompetitive bid allocation the Government received $20,000 for leasing this approximately 40,000 acres. According to Mr. Marion Clawson, former Director of the Bureau of Land Management of the Department of the Interior in Washington, D.C., had the Government leased these lands on the normal competitive bid basis, the Government would have realized a minimum of $500,000 premium, and he stated that many private operators had placed this estimate as high as $1½ million premium the Government would have received on the same lands.

This is only one instance, but there are many more which could be cited; and certainly even if there is only one this bill should be enacted.

There can be no possible justification as to why the Federal Government should not lease all of its public lands at all times at the most favorable rates available, and the adoption of the bill which I am introducing today would make this mandatory. At a time when our national deficit is exceeding $1 billion per month, certainly all sources of revenue should be considered.

This bill merely provides that the Department of the Interior in negotiating these leases for the American taxpayers shall exercise the same sound business principles which would be exercised by them were they leasing their own property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1678) to amend the Mineral Leasing Act for acquired lands to require competitive bidding for leases of deposits of oil and gas not within any known geological structure of a producing oil or gas field, introduced by Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

CONSTRUCTION OF CIVIL DEFENSE SHELTERS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide for the construction of civil defense shelters in conjunction with urban renewal areas anywhere in the United States.

Nearly 400 cities in 42 States already participate in the Federal urban renewal program, and every community is eligible to apply.

The Federal Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization estimates that in the event of a massive enemy attack, existing shelter facilities could adequately protect less than 1 percent of our entire population.

It is almost incredible that this dread prospect confronts us in 1959, the 10th year since we first learned that another country had developed the capacity to wage thermonuclear warfare. Recently, Premier Khrushchev repeated his boast that the Soviet Union, with split second preparations, could launch an attack with intercontiental missiles armed with nuclear warheads against any people on earth. The threat was clearly directed at the United States. We cannot mark time on civil defense under these circumstances.

The prime targets in a sneak attack against us are our densely populated major cities with a heavy concentration of industry. Estimates of what it would cost to construct shelters to furnish protection against a direct blast and fallout in 150 of these cities range up to a Federal expenditure of $50 billion. However, by helping to finance civil defense facilities in connection with urban renewal projects for a tiny fraction of that cost—about 7½ percent of the anticipated urban renewal authorization for next year—we can initiate a construction program which would stimulate a major civil defense shelter effort by States and localities.

Under the terms of my bill, those participating communities which currently contribute one-third of the funds needed for slum clearance and redevelopment compared to a two-thirds contribution in capital grants by the Federal Government, would receive additional money to build shelters on urban renewal sites.

To illustrate, had this provision been a part of the law in June 1958, 180 urban renewal projects then under way would have been eligible to receive an additional $30 million over and above the Federal contribution required of about $400 million for the construction of civil defense shelters. The 400,000 residents in these projects would then have had some measure of protection against radioactive fallout following a nuclear attack.

Despite periodic public skepticism regarding shelters, defense authorities view them quite plainly as a life or death proposition. The Rand Corp.'s report, titled a "Study of Nonmilitary Defense," estimates that even in the event of a 30- to 50-minute warning, a nuclear attack against 150 major U.S. cities with no civil defense facilities could just about destroy our country. A system of fallout shelters plus provision for tactical evacuation of part of the population following attack warning would cut fatalities nearly in half. A combination of blast and fallout shelters, with rapid entry and evacuation of part of the population prior to attack, would theoretically cut the fatality rate 95 percent, according to the Rand report.

Last year, the Federal Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization launched a program of public education on the effects of fallout, with the objective of accelerating preparations for radiation protection in recognition of the fact that public awareness of the devastation which could be wrought by nuclear warfare far outstrips our knowledge of what personal precautions are essential to survival following an attack. This type of education in civilian defense techniques is all to the good, but we must be alive to use them.

Positive Federal action to initiate a national shelter program is the best kind of proof we can hold up to any potential enemy that a surprise strike against the United States would not catch our civilian population off guard and knock us out in one blow—that such a gamble would, instead, end in destruction of the aggressor nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1680) to amend section 106 of the Housing Act of 1949 with respect to the provision of civil defense shelter facilities in urban renewal areas, introduced by Mr. JAVITS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

HOME RULE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am informed that the Judiciary Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia intends shortly to open hearings on proposed legislation conveying to the residents of the city of Washington a measure of home rule.

At the present time there are two differing proposals before the subcommittee. One is Senate Joint Resolution 10, which I introduced January 12, 1959, and the other is S. 659, introduced at the request of the Board of Commissioners on January 23, 1959.

Today I introduce, and ask for its appropriate reference, a measure which embodies the true home rule principles of the Neely-Morse proposal which passed the Senate in the 84th Congress as S. 669.

I do this, Mr. President, because it is my judgment that the subcommittee should have before it a clear cut alternative to the pending measures. I do not assert that each clause and section of the bill I now introduce is perfect. As a matter of fact, because of the changes which have occurred since the passage of the old Neely-Morse bill in 1955, there have been incorporated in this new version many technical improvements and I am sure that many more can and should be made. Since I believe this to be true, there is no inconsistency in averring that of all home rule measures before the subcommittee, Senate Joint Resolution 10 seems to me to provide the best solution toward obtaining a sound and effective home rule act. However, it is also true that the subcommittee may prefer to recommend a bill rather than the resolution and I want them to have an opportunity to consider a measure which will in form and substance provide a true home rule philosophy and procedure.

Last August 6, during the colloquy which preceded the passage in the Senate of the ill-starred S. 1846, which is identical with S. 659 of this session, I made no bones of the fact that I considered it to be bad legislation. My grounds of objection were based upon the sound position that I do not consider the power to choose an appointive executive as equivalent in fact to giving the franchise to the citizens of the Capital. When this patronage appointee, for such is the titular Governor of the asserted territorial form, is bolstered in his monolithic dominance by a Presidential second veto power, I hold that the freedom which the city of Washington should have is forfeit to the executive branch. The only change which would result would be the replacement of the present three-man appointive Board by a two-man appointive Board with the senior of the two holding the whip hand.

There are a goodly number of well-intentioned citizens who have, however, swallowed whole the political hokum of the administration's position, including, I regret to state, a leader in the Democratic Party in the District. I sincerely hope that when the present hearings are concluded the citizens will have been converted to the proposition that their own best interest lies with legislation making this Capital a true city under a locally elected mayor, council, and school board, rather than a political monstrosity.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1681) to provide an elected mayor, city council, school board, and nonvoting Delegate to the House of Representatives for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, subject to the retention by Congress of the ultimate legislative authority over the Nation's Capital which is granted by the Constitution, it is the intent of Congress to restore to the inhabitants of the District of Columbia the powers of local self-government which are a basic privilege of all American citizens; to reaffirm through such action the confidence of the American people in the strengthened validity of principles of local self-governmet by the elective process; to promote among the inhabitants of the District the sense of responsibility for the development and well-being of their community which will result from the enjoyment of such powers of self-government; to provide for the more effective participation in the development of the District and in the solution of its local problems by those persons who are most closely concerned; and to relieve the National Legislature of the burden of legislating upon purely local District matters. It is the further intention of Congress to exercise its retained ultimate legislative authority over the District only insofar as such action shall be necessary or desirable in the interest of the Nation. Finally, it is recognized that the restoration of the powers of local self-government to the inhabitants of the District by this Act will in no way change the need, which arises from the unique character of the District as the Nation's Capital, for the payment by the Federal Government of a share of the expenses of the District government; and it is intended that an equitable share thereof shall be paid annually.

Procedure for Zoning Acts

SEC. 337. (a) Before any zoning act for the District is passed by the District Council—

(1) the District Council shall deposit the act in its introduced form, with the National Capital Planning Commission. Such Commission shall within thirty days after the date of such deposit, report to the District Council whether the proposed act is in conformity with the comprehensive plan for the District of Columbia. The District Council may not pass the act unless it has received such report or the Commission has failed to report within the thirty-day period above specified; and

(2) the District Council (or an appropriate committee thereof) shall hold a public hearing on the act. At least thirty days' notice of the hearing shall be published as the Council may direct. Such notice shall include the time and place of the hearing and a summary of all changes in existing law which would be made by adoption of the act. The District Council (or committee thereof holding the hearing) shall give such additional notice as it finds expedient and practicable. At the hearing interested persons shall be given reasonable opportunity to be heard. The hearing may be adjourned from time to time. The time and place of the adjourned meeting shall be publicly announced before adjournment is had.

(b) The District Council shall deposit with the National Capital Planning Commission each zoning act passed by it. If in the opinion of the Commission such act, as passed, would adversely affect the interests of the Federal Government, the Commission, shall within thirty days after the date of such deposit certify to the District Council its disapproval of such act. If such certification of disapproval is not made within such thirty-day period, the zoning act shall take effect as law on the day following the expiration of such period. (d) The officers and agencies of the District government shall furnish to the Board of Elections, upon request of such Board, such space and facilities in public buildings in the District to be used as registration or polling places, and such records, information, services, personnel, offices, and equipment, and such other assistance and facilities, as may be necessary to enable such Board properly to perform its functions.

(1) in any even-numbered calendar year commencing with 1960; and

(2) in any odd-numbered calendar year commencing with 1961, if an act authorizing the issuance of bonds required by section 602 to be submitted for a referendum at an election is enacted at least forty days prior to the date for conducting the election in such year.

(b) Such general elections shall be held on the fourth Tuesday before the Tuesday in November prescribed hereafter for runoff elections.

(c) Any runoff elections required to be held pursuant to section 905 shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November.

(c) The term of an elective office on the Board of Education shall be two years beginning on January 1 of the odd-numbered year following such election.

(d) The term of office of the Mayor shall be four years, beginning on January 1, 1961, and on January 1, following such election, of every other odd-numbered year thereafter.

(e) The term of office of the District Delegate shall be two years begining at noon on January 3 of the odd-numbered year following such election.

Vacancies

SEC. 904. (a) Vacancies in the office of Mayor, in the District Council or in the Board of Education shall be filled at the next general election held pursuant to section 902 for which it is possible for candidates to be nominated following the occurrence of the vacancy. A person elected to fill a vacancy shall take office as soon as practicable following the certification of his election by the Board of Elections and shall hold office for the duration of the unexpired term to which he was elected but not beyond the end of such term.

(b) If the office of Delegate becomes vacant at a time when the unexpired term of such office is six months or more, a special election and, if necessary, a runoff election shall be held, at such time and in such manner (comparable to that prescribed for general elections) as the Board of Elections shall prescribe.

(c) Until a vacancy in the office of Mayor, in the District Council or in the Board of Education can be filled in the manner prescribed in subsection (a) hereof, a vacancy in the office of Mayor shall be filled by appointment by the District Council; and a vacancy in the District Council or in the Board of Education shall be filled by appointment by the Mayor. No person shall be qualified for appointment to any office under this subsection unless, if nominated, he would have been a qualified candidate for such office at the last election conducted prior to or on the date the vacancy occurred. A person appointed to fill a vacancy under this subsection shall hold office until the time provided for an elected successor to take office, but not beyond the end of the term during which the vacancy occurred.

What Candidates Are Elected

SEC. 905. At any general election, a candidate for Delegate or a candidate for Mayor who receives a majority of the votes validly cast for such office shall be elected. At any general election, each of the three candidates in each ward for positions on the District Council and each of the three candidates in each ward for positions on the Board of Education, receiving the highest number of valid votes, shall be elected if he receives more than one-sixth of the total number of votes validly cast in the District for all candidates in his ward for the position for which he is a candidate. In case any office is unfilled because of failure of any candidate to receive in any general election the necessary proportion of votes validly cast, there shall be a runoff election to fill such office. In such runoff election the candidates shall be the persons who were the unsuccessful candidates for the unfilled offices in the general election, and who received the highest number of valid votes in that election, to the number of twice the offices to be filled. The candidate or candidates receiving the highest number of votes validly cast in the runoff election shall be elected. In any election in which there are two or more similar positions to be filled in any ward, a vote for any candidate for such a position in that ward will be valid only if the ballot records votes for as many candidates for such positions in that ward as there are positions to be filled.

Qualified Electors

SEC. 906. No person shall vote in an election unless he meets the qualifications of an elector specified in this section and has registered pursuant to section 907 of this Act or section 7 of the District Primary Act. A qualified elector of the District shall be any person (1) who has maintained a domicile or place of abode in the District continuously during the one-year period ending on the day of election, (2) who is a citizen of the United States, (3) who is on the day of the election at least twenty-one years old, (4) who has never been convicted of a felony in the United States, or, if he has been so convicted, has been pardoned, (5) who is not mentally incompetent, as adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction, and (6) who certifies that he has not, within one year immediately preceding the election, voted in any election at which candidates for any municipal offices (other than in the District of Columbia) were on the ballot.

Registration

SEC. 907. (a) No person shall be registered unless—

(1) he shall be able to qualify otherwise as an elector on the day of the next election; and

(2) he executes, in the presence of an employee of the Board of Elections authorized to take oaths for such purposes, a registration affidavit on a form prescribed by the Board of Elections showing that he will meet on the day of the election all the requirements of section 906 of this Act—

(A) that he meets each of the requirements specified in section 906 for a qualified elector for the office for which he intends to vote;

(B) that he meets the requirements of paragraph (2) of this subsection; and

(C) that he has no intention of doing any act which would prevent him from being a qualified elector on the day of the next election.

(b) If a person is not permitted to register, such person, or any qualified candidate, may appeal to the Board of Elections, but not later than three days after the registry is closed for the next election. The Board shall decide within seven days after the appeal is perfected whether the challenged elector is entitled to register. If the appeal is denied the appellant may, within three days after such denial, appeal to the Municipal Court for the District of Columbia. The court shall decide the issue not later than eighteen days before the day of the election. The decision of such court shall be final and not appealable. If the appeal is upheld by either the Board or the court, the challenged elector shall be allowed to register immediately. If the appeal is pending on election day, the challenged elector may cast a ballot marked "challenged", as provided in section 911.

(c) For the purposes of this Act, the Board of Elections shall keep open, during normal hours of business, Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays excepted, a central registry office and shall conduct registration at such other times and places as the Board of Elections shall deem appropriate. The Board of Elections may suspend the registration of voters, or the acceptance of changes in registrations for such period, not exceeding thirty days, next preceding any election as it may deem necessary and appropriate.

Qualified Candidates

SEC. 908. The candidates at an election in the District shall be the persons, registered under section 907 of this Act or under section 7 of the District Primary Act, who have been nominated as provided in section 909 of this Act: Provided, That no member of the Board of Elections may be such a candidate.

Nominations

SEC. 909. (a) Nomination of a candidate shall take place when the Board of Elections receives a petition in accordance with rules, not inconsistent with this Act, prescribed by the Board either—

(1) a declaration of candidacy accompanied by a filing fee equal to 5 per centum of the annual compensation for which nomination is sought; said fee to be refunded—

(A) if the candidate withdraws his candidacy in writing received by the Board not more than three days after the last day on which nominations may be made; or

(B) if the candidate polls 10 per centum or more of the total vote cast for that office; or

(2) a nominating petition signed by the number of registered voters specified below, without payment of a filing fee: Provided—

(A) that any petition for a candidate for the office of District Delegate be signed by six hundred qualified electors registered in the District, and

(B) that any petition for a candidate for the District Council be signed by three hundred qualified electors registered in the ward from which he is nominated for such office.

(b) No person may be a candidate for more than one office in any election. If a person is nominated for more than one office, he shall, within three days after the last day on which nominations may be made (as prescribed by the Board of Elections), notify the Board of Elections for which such office he elects to run.

(c) The Board of Elections is authorized to accept any nominating petition as bona fide with respect to the qualifications of the signatories thereto: Provided, That the originals or facsimile copies thereof shall have been posted in a suitable public place for at least ten days: And provided further, That no challenge as to the qualifications of the signatories shall have been received in writing by the Board of Elections within ten days of first posting of such petition.

(d) The Board of Elections may, at its discretion, declare elected, without an actual count of the votes cast, any unopposed candidate.

Nonpartisan Elections

SEC. 910. (a) Ballots and voting machines shall show no party affiliations, emblem, or slogan.

(b) Section 16 of the Act entitled "An Act to prevent pernicious political activities", approved August 2, 1939 (53 Stat. 1147), is amended by inserting immediately after "exists in" the following: "the District of Columbia or".

Method of Voting

SEC. 911. (a) Voting in all elections shall be secret. Voting may be by paper ballot or voting machine.

(b) The ballot shall show the wards from which each candidate (other than for District Delegate and Mayor) has been nominated. Each voter shall be entitled to vote for nine candidates for the District Council, not more than three from each ward; for nine candidates for the Board of Education, not more than three from each ward; for one candidate for Mayor and for one candidate for District Delegate. No person shall be a candidate from more than one ward.

(c) The ballot of a person who is registered as a resident of the District shall be valid only if cast in the voting precinct where the residence shown on his registration is located.

(d) Absentee balloting shall be permitted under regulations adopted by the Board of Elections.

(e) At least ten days prior to the date of any referendum or election, any group of citizens or individual candidates interested in the outcome of the election may petition the Board of Elections for credentials authorizing watchers at any and all polling places during the voting hours and until the count has been completed. The Board of Elections shall formulate rules and regulations, not inconsistent with provisions of this title, to prescribe the form of watchers' credentials, to govern their conduct, and to limit the number of watchers so that the conduct of the election will not be unreasonably obstructed.

(f) If the official in charge of the polling place, after hearing both parties to any such challenge or acting on his own initiative with respect to a prospective voter, reasonably believes the prospective voter is unqualified to vote, he shall allow the voter to cast a paper ballot marked "challenged." Ballots so cast shall be segregated, and no such ballot shall be counted until the challenge has been removed as provided in subsection (g).

(g) If a person has been permitted to vote only by challenged ballot, such person, or any qualified candidate, may appeal to the Board of Elections within three days after election day. The Board shall decide within seven days after the appeal is perfected whether the voter was qualified to vote. If the Board decides that the voter was qualified to vote, the word "challenged" shall be stricken from the voter's ballot and the ballot shall be treated as if it had not been challenged.

(h) If a voter is physically unable to mark his ballot or operate the voting machine, the official in charge of the voting place may enter the voting booth with him and vote as directed. Upon the request of any such voter, a second election official may enter the voting booth to assist in the voting. The officials shall tell no one what votes were cast. The official in charge of the voting place shall make a return of all such voters, giving their names and disabilities.

(i) A voter shall vote only once with respect to each office to be filled.

(j) Copies of the regulations of the Board of Elections with respect to voting shall be made available to prospective voters at each polling place.

(k) Before being allowed to vote the voter shall sign a certificate, on a form to be prescribed by the Board of Elections, that he has duly registered under the election laws of the District and that, to his best knowledge and belief, he has not since such registration done any act which might disqualify him as an elector.

Recounts and Contests

SEC. 912. (a) The provisions of section 11 of the District Primary Act with respect to recounts and contests shall be applicable to any election or referendum held under this Act, except that in the case of a referendum any qualified voter who has voted in such referendum may petition the Board of Elections for a recount of the votes cast in one or more precincts under the same conditions required of a candidate for office under section 11(a) of the District Primary Act. These provisions shall be applicable to the referenda held until titles VI, XV, and XVII of this Act notwithstanding the fact that the provisions of this title do not otherwise take effect unless the charter referendum provided in title XV is adopted.

(b) If the court voids all or part of an election under this section, and if it determines that the number and importance of the matters involved outweigh the cost and practical disadvantages of holding another election, it may order a special election for the purpose of voting on the matters with respect to which the election was declared void.

(c) Special elections shall be conducted in a manner comparable to that prescribed for regular elections and at times and in the manner prescribed by the Board of Elections by regulation. A person elected at such an election shall take office on the day following the date on which the Board of Elections certifies the results of the election.

(d) Vacancies resulting from voiding all or part of an election shall be filled as prescribed in section 904.

Interference With Registration or Voting

SEC. 913. (a) No one shall interfere with the registration or voting of another person, except as it may be reasonably necessary in the performance of a duty imposed by law. No person performing such a duty shall interfere with the registration or voting of another person because of his race, color, sex, or religious belief, or his want of property or income.

(b) No registered voter shall be required to perform a military duty on election day which would prevent him from voting, except in time of war or public danger or unless he is away from the District in military service. No registered voter may be arrested while voting or going to vote except for a breach of the peace then committed or for treason or felony.

Violations

SEC. 914. Whoever willfully violates any provision of this title, or of any regulation prescribed and published by the Board of Elections under authority of this title, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned for not more than six months, or both.

Except where the terms and conditions governing the furnishing of such services are prescribed by other provisions of law, such services shall be furnished pursuant to a contract (1) negotiated by the Federal and District authorities concerned, and (2) approved by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget and by the Mayor, by and with the advice and consent of the District Council. Each such contract shall provide that the cost of furnishing such services shall be borne in the manner provided in subsection (c) by the Government to which such services are furnished at rates or charges based on the actual cost of furnishing such services.

Any function so delegated may be exercised in accordance with the terms of the delegation.

No member of the District Council and no other officer or employee of the District with power of discretion in the making of any contract to which the District is a party or in the sale to the District or to a contractor supplying the District of any land or rights or interests in any land, material, supplies, or services shall have a financial interest, direct or indirect, in such contract or sale. Any willful violation of this section shall constitute malfeasance in office, and any officer or employee of the District found guilty thereof shall thereby forfeit his office or position. Any violation of this section with the knowledge express or implied of the person contracting with the District shall render the contract voidable by the Mayor or the District Council.

Compensation From More Than One Source

SEC. 1003. (b) The right to another office or position or to compensation from another source otherwise secured to such a person under the laws of the United States shall not be abridged by the fact of his service or receipt of compensation as a member of the District Council or either such Board, if such service does not interfere with the discharge of his duties in such other office or position.

(c) For the purpose of sections 281, 283, 284, 434, and 1914 of title 18 of the United States Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes (5 U.S.C. 99), no person shall, by reason of membership on the District Council, the Board of Education, or the Board of Elections or by reason of his serving in any position in or under the government of the District of Columbia, be considered to be an officer or employee of the United States.

(a) No suit, action, or other judicial proceeding lawfully commenced by or against any officer or agency in his or its official capacity or in relation to the exercise of his or its official functions, shall abate by reason of the taking effect of any provision of this Act, but the court, unless it determines that the survival of such suit, action, or other proceeding is not necessary for purposes of settlement of the questions involved, shall allow the same to be maintained, with such substitutions as to parties as are appropriate.

(b) No administrative action or proceeding lawfully commenced shall abate solely by reason of the taking effect of any provision of this Act, but such action or proceeding shall be continued with such substitutions as to parties and officers or agencies as are appropriate.

TITLE XVII—REFERENDUM

SEC. 1701. (a) The qualified electors (as defined in section 906) shall have power, pursuant to the procedure provided by this title, to approve or reject in a referendum any act of the District Council, or part or parts thereof, which has become law, whether or not such act is yet operative. This power shall not extend, however, to acts authorizing the issuance of bonds, which shall be subject to the referendum provisions contained in section 602, or to acts continuing existing taxes or making appropriations which in the aggregate are not in excess of those for the preceding fiscal year. Within forty-five days after an act subject to this title has been enacted, a petition signed by qualified electors equal in number to at least ten per centum of the number who voted at the last preceding general election may be filed with the Secretary of the District Council requesting that any such act or any part or parts thereof be submitted to a vote of the qualified electors.

(b) The Board of Elections shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary or appropriate with respect to the form, filing, examination, amendment, and certification of petitions for referenda and with respect to the conduct of any referendum held under this title.

Effect of Certification of Referendum Petition

SEC. 1702. (a) When a referendum petition has been certified as sufficient, the act, or the one or more items, sections or parts thereof, specified in the petition shall not become operative, or further action shall be suspended if it shall have become operative, until and unless approved by the electors, as provided in this title. The filing of a referendum petition against one or more parts of an act shall not alter the operative effect of the remainder of such act.

(b) If, within thirty days after the filing of a referendum petition, the Secretary has not specified the particulars in which a petition is defective, the petition shall be deemed sufficient for the purpose of this title.

Submission to Electors

SEC. 1703. An act with respect to which a petition for a referendum has been filed and certified as sufficient shall be submitted to the qualified electors at a referendum to be held in connection with the first general election which occurs not less than thirty days nor more than one year from the date on which the Secretary files his certificate of the sufficiency of the petition. The District Council shall, if no general election is to be held within such period, provide for a special election for the purpose of conducting the referendum.

Availability of List of Qualified Electors

SEC. 1704. If any organization or group requests it for the purpose of circulating descriptive matter relating to the act to be voted on at a referendum, the Board of Elections shall either permit such organization or group to copy the names and addresses of the qualified electors or furnish it with a list thereof, at a charge to be determined by the Board of Elections, not exceeding the actual cost of reproducing such list.

Results of Referendum

SEC. 1705. An act which is submitted to a referendum which is not approved by a majority of the qualified electors voting thereon shall thereupon be deemed repealed. If a majority of the qualified electors voting thereon approve the act, it shall become operative on the day following the day on which the Board of Elections certifies the results of the referendum. If conflicting acts are approved by the electors at the same referendum, the one receiving the greatest number of affirmative votes shall prevail to the extent of such conflict. As used in this section, the word "Act" shall mean the complete Act, or any part or parts thereof, specified in the petition for referendum.

TITLE XVIII—TITLE OF ACT

SEC. 1801. This Act, divided into titles and sections according to table of contents, and including the declaration of congressional policy which is a part of such Act, may be cited as the "District of Columbia Charter Act".

FREEDOM COMMISSION AND FREEDOM ACADEMY

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator of Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and myself I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to create a Freedom Commission to undertake the establishment of a Freedom Academy to train Americans and foreign visitors from the free world to better understand the nature of the international Communist conspiracy and to develop effective methods of combating its propaganda and espionage activities.

Last week, the Senator from Illinois and I attended the annual meeting of the Council Against Communist Aggression, which was held in the Washington Hotel, in this city. At that meeting we heard inspiring and informative addresses by Representatives WALTER JUDD, of Minnesota, and SID HERLONG, of Florida, in support of legislation of this type which they have introduced in the House of Representatives. The proposed legislation grew out of the experiences and recommendations of the so-called Orlando group, which for several years down in Orlando, Fla., has been conducting a citywide educational campaign to alert and acquaint the students and adults of Orlando, Fla., about the true significance and the specific objectives of atheistic communism as it is being directed today from Moscow, Russia. In my own remarks at the council meeting I told the group that the Senator from Illinois and I would be glad to introduce a companion bill in the Senate.

Mr. President, a recent editorial in Life magazine, entitled "For a Political West Point," spells out in striking language the need for the free countries of the world to start training cadres of citizens who recognize the evils of communism for what they are and who are equipped to refute and repel the insidious propaganda and the cold war tactics of international communism.

I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from the editorial be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Neither the Red army nor straight Marxist propaganda, with all their power, could alone have created student riots in Venezuela, frustrated the parliamentary system of Italy, won an election in the most literate state in India (Kerala), retained key footholds in the British and American labor movements, ridden the street whirlwinds of Baghdad to the edge of power, dazzled the opening mind of Africa, or poisoned strategic corners of press and university opinion from Paris to Tokyo. These are organizational successes, the fruit of long and rigorous training of dedicated individuals in a conspiratorial technique.

Lies and terror, as well as bribery and argument, are parts of this technique. But that is not the reason the free world has failed to counter it. Apathy and ignorance are the reasons. Given the will, the Communist political war can be countered by open and ethical methods which will uphold the values as well as the institutions of freedom.

The Herlong-Judd bill attempts to focus and organize this potential counteraction. It sets up what is tentatively called a Freedom Academy but what is really a West Point of political war. To selected candidates from the United States and all free countries, it would offer intensive courses in Communist political techniques and how to reverse or resist them. A graduate—whether American oilman, Indian peasant leader, African nationalist, Mexican labor boss, Japanese mayor, or Indonesian bookseller—would be thus better equipped to meet the Communists, technique for technique and argument for argument, on his home ground. It sounds like a tall order. It is. The Soviets have scores of academies for training Communists in this operational science. They are way ahead of us. But the makings of a counterscience exist.

It will be objected that counteraction is too negative and static a concept for the cause of freedom. But it is surely not a negative act to collect and disseminate what knowledge we have about political infighting. Moreover, while diversity of belief is a hallmark of free man, a closer knowledge of their common enemy is bound to result in wider areas of free agreement and more constructive policies to promote freedom.

The Communist challenge does not confine itself to conventional arenas. As one good textbook puts it (Philip Selznick's "Organizational Weapon"), it tries to make all our institutions political and fights not only at the top but "everywhere in the social structure, wherever an increment of power can be squeezed from control of an institution or a portion of it." The big problem in meeting this total challenge is to avoid innocence on the one hand and hysteria on the other. An official academy would be the best guardian of a cool perspective. Thus the debate on the Herlong-Judd bill should certainly not divide the country along partisan or liberal-conservative lines; men of every political color except one can unite behind this proposal. It should be supported by all who take the Communist threat as seriously as the Communists intend it.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, the Communist cold war against the free nations and again our free institutions is being fought by Communist agents in almost every walk of life. They have infiltrated our universities, our cultural and religious groups, our labor and farm organizations, our newspapers, and such media of communication and entertainment as radio, TV, and the motion-picture industry. They utilize economic weapons, propaganda warfare, espionage, front organizations, innocent dupes, and gullible idealists who fail to realize either the dangers of communism or the fact that their good intentions are being perverted for tyrannical purposes.

To effectively offset and defeat the Communist organizational weapons, we need trained, dedicated people who understand the Communist strategy and who appreciate the tactics and the realities of a total global power struggle. Such an academy as that proposed in the Mundt-Douglas bill in the Senate and the Herlong-Judd bill in the House would have the means and the objective of providing the free world with skilled operatives to promote freedom's side of this cold war into which we have reluctantly but realistically been forced.

It is not our intention to emulate Communist conspiratorial techniques in conducting our side of this global struggle. Our methods and techniques can and should be developed in full harmony with our democratic principles, our Christian ethics, and our civilized concept of morality. With right on our side, however, we should be able to evolve methods and techniques far more effective than those utilized by the Communists to exploit those with whom they come in contact.

As was pointed out by the Council Against Communist Aggression recently:

The Communists now have the lead time of half a century; for them it is already high noon. For us, it is the choice between continued darkness or early dawn. Let us choose the dawn and choose it now. The choice will not be ours again.

At least since the October revolution in 1917, international communism has had the world as its target. We are late—very late—in developing the proper, effective methods for repelling it. But there is still time if we devote our great American talents, vision, and resources to this immediate problem. I sincerely hope that before this session of Congress adjourns we shall have set in motion the training of the essential forces of freedom to help to hold what is left of the free world and to begin the necessary work of pushing the boundaries of communism back closer and closer to their home base in the Kremlin. Once compelled to retreat, communism may collapse entirely, and much more rapidly than is generally realized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1689) to create the Freedom Commission for the development of the science of counteraction to the world Communist conspiracy and for the training and development of leaders in a total political war, introduced by Mr. MUNDT (for himself and Mr. DOUGLAS), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF MUTUAL DEFENSE ASSISTANCE CONTROL ACT OF 1951

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] and myself, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Battle Act of 1951. This bill, which would give greater discretion to the President in granting assistance to satellite nations in the event that it might help to maintain those nations free from full Communist domination, is essentially the same as the bill which I introduced last year and which was considered as an amendment to the Mutual Security Act.

Unhappily, that amendment was defeated by one vote on the floor of the Senate, after the State Department determined that this bill would best be considered as separate legislation. The State Department has meanwhile reevaluated the bill, and the administration is now prepared to give the present bill its full support.

This bill is too important for it to become a matter of partisan bickering and misunderstanding. It is clearly intended to provide our Government with a more effective tool in meeting the threat of Sino-Soviet communism. We have found from sad experience that our own arsenal of weapons for use behind the Iron Curtain is very nearly empty. The pleasant slogans of liberation have had a hollow echo. The diplomatic approaches to a Russian troop withdrawal have not thus far been fruitful. We have been able to do very little through refugee relief or propaganda appeal or by U.N. resolution.

We cannot any longer count on freedom to come to Poland and other nations of Eastern Europe by means of dramatic or violent revolution. Our best hope is rather in more nations following the example of Poland, Yugoslavia, and Finland in moving gradually, if cautiously, away from total Soviet political domination and seeking greater economic independence as well. We are not going to help them revolt or send them arms. We made that clear in 1956. Neither are we helping by woodenly lumping all Eastern European nations together under one label regardless of the differences in their aspirations or operation. We can help by offering the best possible concrete alternatives—by being prepared to take advantage of the first opening—by having ready alternative forms of economic aid to lessen their dependence upon the U.S.S.R. or China. Unfortunately, we cannot do more, certainly we dare not do less.

This amendment is not intended in itself to provide any immediate grant of assistance to any nation. Rather this bill is an attempt to bring the Battle Act, passed in 1951, under completely different historic circumstances, into line with present realities. What it suggests is that there be the possibility of acting quickly and effectively if in the future any of the now subjected nations has a chance of loosening its ties to the U.S.S.R. and if the President feels that a grant of assistance would serve to encourage greater independence by those nations.

Under the present Battle Act legislation, we are able to grant assistance only on a finding that a given country is not Soviet controlled or dominated—a finding which is difficult to make in a twilight situation such as existed in Poland in 1956. And even so, the only limited avenues of assistance which are open under the Battle Act are the President's Emergency Fund—limited to $30 million per year—and the sale provisions of Public Law 480 under which a country such as Poland can buy certain food products. This is an exceedingly cumbersome set of tools, which prevented the President from acting in the Polish situation only after several months of negotiation. In the case of Hungary, we were unable to act at all. Today there is no new country where such action is desirable immediately—but who can predict, in view of the outbreaks of the past 3 years in East Germany, Hungary, Poland, and Yugoslavia, what the next few years will bring?

Moreover, if this amendment is passed, we can improve the effectiveness of those aid agreements which we already have made and might contemplate making with the Government of Poland. Many of the humanitarian and special economic benefits which other nations attain through Public Law 480 are not available to Poland—reloaning of accumulated currencies for educational training, special welfare projects, and the like. Moreover, in providing sufficient dollar assistance, it would be desirable to provide our Government with the option of granting assistance through the Export-Import Bank, now wholly denied by the Battle Act.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Foreign Relations Committee will hold hearings on this bill during the next weeks and that we can consider this legislation constructively. If we pass this proposed legislation, there is a real opportunity for giving our foreign policy a flexibility which might exploit cracks in the Iron Curtain. To the valiant people of Poland and the other subjected states of East Europe, this is one of the few practical demonstrations that we in the Congress can give to assure them that their hopes can yet be realized in the years ahead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1697) to amend the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and Mr. AIKEN), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

GOVERNMENT RELEASE OF STOCKPILED COPPER

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, there have been rumors going around for the past several days to the effect that an agency of the Government is seeking permission from various departments within the executive branch to dispose of up to 128,000 short tons of copper in the Government inventory. These rumors have reached such a stage that within the past 2½ weeks the price of copper has declined 2½ cents on the London market.

Everyone knows what a difficult situation the copper mining industry in this country has occupied over the past several years; and for that matter, the hard metal industry. It has been the most blighted area in the field of unemployment, and the depressed condition has been quite evident until recently. Now we have this attempt on the part of a Mr. Price, who I understand lives on Long Island and visits Washington once a week, as a consultant to the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, headed by former Gov. Leo Hoegh, of Iowa, to dump Government-owned copper on the domestic market.

This has come to the attention of those of us from the hard rock mining States as an attempt being made to shift a large portion, if not all, of the 128,000 short tons into the domestic market, with the possibility that if that is done the price decline which has become evident in the past 2½ weeks will become precipitate in the days ahead.

Mr. President, yesterday my colleague, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senators from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN and Mr. GOLDWATER], the Senators from Utah [Mr. BENNETT and Mr. MOSS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senators from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE and Mr. CANNON], the Senators from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA and Mr. HART], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN], the Senators from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ and Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] and myself addressed a joint letter to the Honorable Leo A. Hoegh, Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization. In that letter we stated:

DEAR MR. DIRECTOR: We are disturbed by reports that your agency is seriously considering the release to industry of certain quantities of copper now held in the DPA stockpile.

You doubtless are aware of the fact that within recent days the price of copper has substantially decreased, and we are advised by the domestic copper producing industry that London market sources report the drop in the London market is due to the above mentioned reports and rumors in the copper market places of the world.

In the last two weeks, the domestic custom smelter price has declined 2 cents per pound—

I interpolate to say at this point that the price has declined another half cent since yesterday.

I continue the letter:

and the London price has declined 2¼ cents per pound.

We respectfully urge that you immediately announce that there is no plan on the part of the Government to release any stockpiled copper, and we further urge that the DPA inventory of copper be immediately placed in the national stockpile and that such action be publicized.

Unless this action is taken, further drops in the price of copper—to disastrous levels—are inevitable.

It is our considered judgment that the best interest of the country, from both the national security and economic standpoints, will be served by immediate action as outlined above.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish to join with my distinguished friend from Montana in the sponsoring of the resolution which the Senator will submit relative to copper.

Mr. President, the copper industry went through a very depressing period during the past 2 years. Only during the last calendar year has copper once again hit its stride and been able, on the open market, to reach a price which is profitable to the producer and to the miner alike.

The inventory of copper which is owned in its various forms by the Federal Government hangs as a sword over the head of this industry.

Mr. President, I am hopeful that the letter the Senator from Montana has just read will be as productive for the industry as we intended it to be, and I am likewise hopeful that the Senator who is now speaking and other Senators from the copper producing States will pursue this matter, to the end that something will be done to reduce the governmental stockpile and to remove that obstacle to a sure price, which we now have. I think it is one of the most serious things that hangs over the domestic copper market. When we add to it the constant threat of cheap imports, we observe the growing danger to our copper industry in the West.

I commend the Senator for his action this morning.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator from Arizona for his support of the resolution which I am about to submit.

Mr. President, since this is the morning hour, and since I observe the distinguished chairman of the Republican National Committee standing on the floor, I should like to ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 2 minutes, so that the Senator may sit down.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I am still able to stand.

Mr. President, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I submit for appropriate reference a resolution on behalf of myself and Senators MURRAY, HAYDEN, ANDERSON, GOLDWATER, MCNAMARA, and MOSS.

I ask unanimous consent that after I read the resolution, which is very short, it be allowed to lie on the desk until 4 o'clock this afternoon for additional cosponsors, and that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, where immediate action will be undertaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to add the name of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] as a cosponsor of the resolution.

Mr. President, the resolution reads as follows:

Whereas within recent days the price of copper on the London market has declined 2½ cents per pound and the domestic custom smelter price has declined 2 cents per pound, as a result of persistent reports that the executive branch of the Government was about to release to industry certain quantities of copper in the DPA stockpile; and

Whereas copper stocks in the hands of producers and users increased on a worldwide basis by 15,000 tons during the month of March; and

Whereas world copper output was at a record high during the month of March: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the best interests of the country, from both the national security and economic standpoints, will not be served by the release of any part of any governmental inventory of copper at this time, but on the contrary incalculable damage to the national security and the economic well-being of the Nation would result by such action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 101) was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled "World Copper Stocks Are Up 15,000 Tons—Record Mine Output," published in the American Metal Market of this morning.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WORLD COPPER STOCKS ARE UP 15,000 TONS—RECORD MINE OUTPUT—MARCH BROUGHT VIGOROUS RISE IN BOTH PRODUCTION, DELIVERIES; U.S. STOCKS REMAIN LOW

NEW YORK, April 14.—The world's copper mines and refineries produced more metal last month than at any time in history. One result of this alltime record output of copper was another increase in the refined stocks held by producers. Copper Institute statistics released this afternoon show that these stocks increased on a world basis by 15,188 tons in March. This development came in spite of the fact that the producers' deliveries of copper to fabricators rose by about 27,000 tons to the second highest level in history, 270,825 tons.

Producer reserves of copper inside and outside the United States show a contrasting picture. While the refined stocks outside the United States underwent a hefty increase of 17,452 tons in March, the tight domestic supply situation resulted in a decrease of 2,571 tons in U.S.-producer reserves, already considered by most trade observers to be low in view of threatened labor troubles at western mining properties.

U.S. OUTPUT, DELIVERIES RISE

Output of crude copper from domestic mines in March was the third highest on record for any month. It totaled 101,118 tons—only slightly less than March and May of the peak production year of 1956. Production from secondary metal was also up sharply in March to the level of 16,117 tons as U.S. custom smelters had an active month.

Refinery production of copper in the United States declined slightly last month to the level of 140,928 tons. Deliveries by producers to their customers rose by about 4,000 tons from February to 124,220 tons. As a result there was a decline of 2,571 tons in stocks to 82,952 tons, less than 3 weeks supply at the current rate of deliveries.

But while producer stocks in the United States remain low, it was pointed out by one prominent producer here that U.S. fabricators' stocks have increased by 60,000 tons since October. Thus producer stocks in a good measure have shifted into the hands of their customers in recent months.

FOREIGN OUTPUT SETS NEW RECORD

Outside of the United States production from both mines and refineries showed vigorous gains. Mine output increased by about 11,500 tons to 167,598 tons, an all-time record high. Still more mine capacity is expected to be brought in by producers as the year goes on.

Output of copper from foreign refineries also set a new record in March, increasing by about 23,000 tons over February to the peak level of 144,497 tons.

A healthy feature of the foreign statistics is the fact that deliveries of copper abroad also rose by about 23,000 tons in March to the level of 146,605 tons. In spite of the additional metal taken by fabricators outside the United States, however, the stocks of metal abroad rose by 17,452 tons. In the past 5 months, stocks of refined metal outside the United States have increased by 91,398 tons.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I concur completely with the remarks made by my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD].

The situation he has described is indeed serious, and the national security and the economic welfare should not be endangered by the release of any part of the Government-held copper stocks, particularly in view of the fact that world copper output was at a record high during the month of March, and world copper stocks during that month increased by an amount in excess of 15,000 tons.

Only last July, at the urging of the administration, the Senate passed a bill, S. 4036, calling for the purchase by the Government of 150,000 tons of copper, in an effort to stabilize the then disastrously low copper price. Subsequently thereto, following the extended strikes in the copper mines of South Africa, the price of copper rose to a more satisfactory level. Now we are faced with the situation of the price of copper being forced down again to disastrous levels if the proposal to release Government-held inventory is carried out.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article which appeared in today's issue of the Daily Metal Reporter, describing the world's copper stocks and the world copper mine production during the month of March, appear in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FREE WORLD COPPER OUTPUT AT RECORD HIGH IN MARCH—U.S., FOREIGN DELIVERIES ALSO SHOW GAINS—STOCKS INCREASE SHARPLY ABROAD

The copper statistics for March highlighted the following:

An increase in domestic and foreign crude production that made the Free World's output the largest on record.

A substantial gain in domestic and foreign deliveries to consumers.

A slight decrease in domestic refined stocks, but a substantial increase in refined stocks outside the United States.

In evaluating the March statistical position of the metal, what impressed factors in the industry most was that the world's stocks of copper have shown a steady increase for the past 4 months. Beginning with last December through March, the increase has amounted to 51,439 tons, which points up the fact that basically there is no world shortage of the metal.

PAY AND CLASSIFICATION SYSTEM FOR EMPLOYEES OF SENATORS

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, on behalf of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and myself, I submit a resolution which would direct the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration to prepare and present to the Senate a standardized classification and pay system for employees in the offices of Senators.

My proposal directs the committee to formulate and report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date a plan which provides for first, allocation of positions to classes and grade levels based upon duties and responsibilities of these positions; second, establishment of uniform descriptive titles for such positions; and third, creation of uniform salary schedules to be based upon duties and responsibilities, and to include provision for longevity pay increases.

FRAME OF REFERENCE NEEDED

Mr. President, the current controversy over disclosure of the salaries paid members of the staffs of individual Senators has become a tempest in a teapot. The public and the press have an understandable curiosity to know what Senators' assistants and secretaries are paid. Taxpayers' dollars are providing these salaries. But this information, in and of itself, is of little significance unless there exists some knowledge of the duties and responsibilities of the recipients of these salaries.

On the other hand, Members of the Senate have indicated a reluctance to reveal salaries paid their staffs because of a fear that interoffice and intraoffice envy would cause dissension within the Senate office buildings. Although it is reasonable to suspect that such worries would become groundless after the initial impact had dissipated, this concern has assumed a quality of reality which tends to thwart the right of the American people to know where their tax dollars go.

OFFERS SOLUTION TO DUAL PROBLEM

I believe that the suggestion which I advance today contains the key to a satisfactory solution to both these problems.

Furthermore, I regard it as a proposal which represents an effective answer to the current uproar over so-called nepotism. Although I never have had a relative on the Government payroll, I am not opposed to nepotism, per se. After all, such illustrious Members of Congress as Harry Truman, John N. Garner, Arthur H. Vandenberg, and Irving M. Ives have employed their relatives. The question, it seems to me, narrows down to this: Does the relative perform duties and carry responsibilities commensurate with compensation received. That is the crux of the issue.

Employees in Senate offices may be separated generally into three classes: First, executive or policyforming; second, administrative; and third, clerical.

THREE PERSONNEL CLASSES FOUND

Within the first group are individuals who carry such impressive Senate titles as administrative assistant, legislative assistant, press secretary, and executive secretary. These persons assist Senators in preparing policy positions, serve as their intimate advisers on legislative matters, and deal directly with the public, the press, and other senatorial offices on behalf of their employer.

In the second group are persons who are frequently referred to as office manager, research assistant, or personal secretary. They are primarily concerned with major administrative decisions involving correspondence, preparation of materials for distribution to press and public, operation of general office routine and collection of basic data for use in legislative projects.

The third group consists of those usually called secretary, assistant secretary, stenographer, clerk-typist, receptionist, and clerk. They carry out the vital functions of preparation of outgoing correspondence, reproduction of speeches and press releases, greeting visitors, filing documents, and handling telephone calls.

TITLES, DESCRIPTIONS NOT EXCLUSIVE

I have no intention of claiming that these position titles and job descriptions are exclusive. I say only that they are common and general. It is obvious to all familiar with the operations of this body that there exists overlap of functions among the jobs which I have described. But to quarrel with specifics is not, to my mind, to destroy the validity of classification. And to define, however roughly, the jobs which fall within the broad grades which I have suggested is a forward step in providing the public with a standard against which to judge the salary paid individual employees in a particular senatorial office.

Therefore, I suggest to the Senate that the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration be instructed to prepare, after full hearings and discussion, a list of positions and job descriptions which will reflect, as accurately as is possible, the various tasks which are normally associated with the operation of a Senator's office, that these positions and related job descriptions be grouped into several wide classes, subdivided by grade level, and the total proposal submitted to the Senate for its consideration.

COMMITTEE TO SUBMIT PAY SCALE

My resolution also provides that this classification study be accompanied by a suggested pay scale, to include a statement of normal upper and lower limitations consistent with existing statutory prohibitions, for each grade, and a liberal number of pay levels within such grades. In order to permit desirable flexibility, it would seem advisable that pay levels for top positions within a particular grade extend into the salary range allowed in the next grade just above. In addition, the plan should include recommendations for longevity raises to reward long service and take account of increased efficiency gained through experience.

In order that the public and press might have ready access to this information, the appropriate official of the Senate would make available—for general examination by responsible persons—a list of the names of all persons employed by Senators, together with their grade, position, and salary range, but not necessarily the exact pay level, thus preserving a reasonable degree of protection to employee and employer but emphasizing the concept of equal pay for equal work.

PRECEDENT EXISTS FOR PLAN

I fully realize that the various elements of the proposal which I present today may be smothered in a barrage of criticism aimed at establishing that my separate ideas on this subject do not take account of individual differences in personnel and office organization. However, it is important to point out that portions of this suggested system are now in operation in the Senate. For example, under title 2 of the United States Code, detailed salary information is provided, indicating by title the basic annual compensation of positions in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, in the office of the Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper, on committee staffs, and in the Senate Press Gallery. Furthermore, the system which I present in no way interferes with the ability of a Senator to hire persons in whom he has the greatest confidence.

QUESTION MUST BE VIEWED IN CONTEXT

However, the larger point is this: If the public is to have knowledge of the salaries received by all employees of individual Senators, then it should also have information concerning the work performed against which to evaluate the amount paid each employee. And if a plan is adopted which will provide both these essential elements, it should be one which permits sufficient flexibility to allow for ordinary administrative demands relative to staff morale.

I have previously expressed my belief that the Senate as a body should make public salaries of those employed by Senators. I do not believe that my proposal represents a tempering of that position. Rather I think that it is a method by which this body may effectively fulfill its responsibility to the American people. I trust that the Senate will give it full and serious consideration.

Mr. President, I send the resolution to the desk. I am submitting it for myself and the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL] and the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 102) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules and Administration is authorized and directed to formulate and report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date a pay and classification system for employees in the offices of Senators which shall (a) allocate the positions of such employees to classes and grade levels based upon the duties and responsibilities of such positions, (b) establish uniform descriptive titles for such positions, and (c) establish uniform salary schedules for such positions to be based upon the duties and responsibilities thereof, and to include provision for periodic increases based upon longevity.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am very pleased to hear the Senator's remarks with reference to the matter of positions of employment in the Senate and positions of employment in the offices of the respective Senators.

There has been a good deal of talk about the payrolls of Senators and of Members of Congress generally. There has been a good deal of conjecture as to what we pay. Speaking for myself, I have said to representatives of the press that if they wish to come into my office and take a look at my office payroll, they were at liberty to do so. There is nothing to hide so far as I am concerned. I would be more than pleased to have them examine my payroll.

However, as all of us know, at times problems come up in terms of different salary scales in the various offices, which could cause, with the opening up of all the scales, some embarrassment and some difficulty.

Therefore the resolution which the Senator from Oregon is submitting is one which would regularize the salary scales and would provide job descriptions according to the various amounts of income received by our employees. It would do for the legislative branch of the Government what we expect to be done by every other branch of the Government.

I have been contemplating, in conjunction with one or two of my colleagues in the Senate, submitting a resolution asking for the establishment of an outside commission to examine the entire employment policy of the legislative branch of the Government, with the view in mind that the commission would make recommendations which would guide us in terms of legislation.

I believe that the Senator from Oregon is performing a genuine service in submitting his resolution. I am delighted to hear his explanation of it. I know he feels there are undoubtedly areas which he has not fully explored, and that undoubtedly some revisions will be required when the resolution comes before the Committee on Rules and Administration.

However, as I understand what the Senator from Oregon is seeking, it is that we do something constructive about the situation, and not be put in the position, because of the present rules of the Senate, of having to make individual judgments as to whether we should or should not release our payrolls to public view, with the possibility of causing much trouble and concern among our colleagues.

Therefore, I am happy to associate myself with the tenor of the Senator's remarks, and to express the hope that his resolution will receive prompt consideration, and that whatever adjustments may be required will be quickly made. I hope the Senate will proceed to consider carefully the entire matter of senatorial employment, so that there will be no doubt as to the employment practices, the pay scales, and the work performed. The money is paid from public funds. This is public business. I hope the Senator will not have objection to my suggestion to having the resolution lie at the desk so that other Senators may join him in submitting the resolution, and to permit the Senator from Minnesota to join as one of the cosponsors.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I thank the Senator from Minnesota. Of course we are delighted and honored to have him as a cosponsor. He has far more knowledge and experience in the Senate than I have. I certainly welcome his support of the resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may lie on the desk until next Monday for further sponsorship.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I wish to make only a brief comment on what the Senator from Minnesota has so pertinently said. I myself believe there has been a good deal of unfair criticism because certain Senators and Representatives have employed relatives on their staffs. I am not opposed to the employment of relatives, per se, although I myself have no relatives on my payroll.

It seems to me that the question is: Does the relative have the merit and qualifications for the position to which the relative is appointed? After all, we know that relatives are employed in private industry, in the newspaper-publishing business, in banking, and in manufacturing, who hold very high positions on appointment by the heads of such organizations. President Franklin D. Roosevelt had a son as his assistant. Major Eisenhower now is on the staff at the White House. I can see no reason why a person who occupies a position of high responsibility in government should not have associated with him, in an important position, someone he loves and who has the qualifications to fill that position, whether it be at the White House or in the Senate Office Building.

What the resolution seeks to do is to establish classifications and uniform standards for such positions. Then, if some Senator's wife or daughter or son or niece or nephew is holding such a position, there can be some standard against which that particular position could be judged.

I shall follow the suggestion made by my good and wise friend, the senior Senator from Minnesota, and ask that the resolution lie at the desk until next Monday for further sponsorship.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DESIGNATION OF APRIL 15 OF EACH YEAR AS AFRICA FREEDOM DAY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to call to the attention of the Senate the first anniversary of Africa Freedom Day, which is being celebrated today. One year ago, in Accra, the capital of Ghana, the first Conference of African Independent States met; and at that time it issued, among others, the following resolution:

The Conference of Independent African States, convinced that a definite date should be set for the attainment of independence by each of the colonial territories in accordance with the will of the people of the territories and the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, decides that the 15th of April of every year be celebrated as Africa Freedom Day.

That first Conference of African Independent States was attained by the Prime Ministers or Foreign Ministers of Egypt, Ethiopia, Ghana, Liberia, Libya, Morocco, the Sudan, and Tunisia. It is interesting to note that of these eight countries, only three were independent at the end of the Second World War. By the end of 1960, five additional countries will have joined the ranks of the independent African nations; and in another decade only a few enclaves on the African Continent will not be free to determine their own destinies.

The proposal for Africa Freedom Day was endorsed last December by the founding meeting of the All African People's Conference, an unprecedented assembly which was attended by more than 200 nongovernmental delegates representing nationalist movements in 28 African countries, many of them still under colonial rule. We are privileged to have visiting with us in the United States at this time Mr. Tom Mboya, who, as chairman of that great meeting, provided the same kind of farsighted, dynamic leadership for freedom and democracy that has been the hallmark of his service to the people of Kenya.

Mr. President, along with other members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I met with Tom Mboya this week. I think I speak for all those who were in attendance when I say that we were deeply impressed by his dedication to the ideals and principles of democracy, his dedication to improvement of the political, the economic, and the social standards of the African people, and his dedication to nonviolence. He is a powerful force, a young man—under 30 years of age—who is well educated, and a leader of his people.

It seems to me fitting that the United States, itself the product of revolutionary determination to be master of its own destiny, should note and salute the peoples of Africa on this historic anniversary. To that end, I introduce a resolution to the effect that April 15 of each year be recognized as Africa Freedom Day, and that the President be urged to send a special message of good will on that date, each year, to the independent countries of Africa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 103) was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas the emergence of Africa into the forum of world affairs is one of the most significant developments of this period of history; and

Whereas on the African Continent new and independent countries are being born with great rapidity, four of which are joining the free nations of the world in 1960; and

Whereas at the first Conference of African Independent States convened in Ghana last April, the then eight free nations of the continent called for the observation on April 15 of Africa Freedom Day until all Africa is free; and

Whereas this call to the world was reiterated by the All African People's Conference held in Ghana in December 1958; and

Whereas the peoples of Africa are sympathetic to the ideals of democracy espoused by the free world, and look for friendship and assistance from the United States; and

Whereas our American tradition of freedom and independence makes us sympathetic to the desire of all people for self-determination: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that April 15 of each year should be recognized as Africa Freedom Day; and that we urge the President on that date each year to send a special message of good will to the independent countries of Africa.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to join in sponsoring the resolution. I intend to speak later today about Africa.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am more than delighted to have the distinguished senior Senator from New York join in sponsoring the resolution. I ask unanimous consent that his name may be added to it, as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I should like to ask, also, that my name be added to the resolution, as one of its sponsors.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have the name of the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] added to the resolution, as one of its sponsors. I appreciate his support.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I thank the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE subsequently said: Mr. President, today is being celebrated in many parts of the world as Africa Freedom Day. This is an occasion of significance to the United States as well as to the people of Africa. The events that will be taking place on the continent of Africa in the coming months and years will have a serious impact on the entire world.

The people of the United States feel a strong bond of sympathy and support with the people of Africa in their efforts to win the right of self-government. It is therefore sensible that a basic element of our foreign policy should be to aid and encourage the development of the education, social, and economic conditions under which the leaders of Africa can establish responsible, democratic self-government and insure liberty and freedom for their people.

There has been a great increase in the attention which is being directed from this country to the emerging nations of Africa. This attention is going out from our Government, from business enterprises, from our press, and from Americans everywhere. As a result of this growing interest and concern for the people of Africa there will come more effective efforts from the United States—both governmental and private efforts—to help Africans choose and establish the free institutions under which their new nations can flourish in freedom and prosperity.

Mr. JAVITS subsequently said: Mr. President, today, April 15, marks African Independence Day. At the first Conference of African Independent States in Accra last year, a call was issued to the world to observe April 15 of each year as Africa Freedom Day until all Africa is free from colonial rule.

Six African states have achieved national independence since the end of World War II; they are as follows: Ghana, British colony Gold Coast and the Trusteeship territory Togoland, 1957; Guinea, French territory in West Africa, 1958; Libya, under British and French Military Administration since 1942, 1951; Morocco, former French and Spanish Protectorates, 1956; Sudan, Anglo-Egyptian Condominium, 1956; Tunisia, French Protectorate, 1956.

Four other African countries are scheduled to attain independence next year. These are: Cameroons, French territory in French Equatorial Africa; Togoland, French territory under Africa trusteeship; Somalia, Italian trusteeship since 1950; and Nigeria, British colony and Protectorate, Federation of Nigeria.

In addition, the inhabitants of British Cameroons also will have the option, after a plebiscite scheduled to be held between November 1958 and April 30, 1960, of declaring their independence or joining any of the adjoining would-be independent states in Africa.

The peoples of Africa naturally look to the United States for inspiration and as a model in their search toward independence and their efforts to retain their new statehood. A tenth of our American citizens trace their origin to Negro Africa, especially from those areas on the west coast of that continent. American Negroes have recognized this tie of blood and already there are established societies in this country, such as the International Friends of Ghana, whose object it is to help the nascent states in Africa to grow in the highest traditions of freedom and to prosper.

The Soviets have not been unmindful of the opportunities for their own ends in the newly independent states and most recently the press carried reports of growing Communist influence in Guinea. I believe, however, that the peoples of Africa value their freedom too highly to be taken in by a new Communist imperialism, though the Soviets will continue to fish in the troubled waters where the new states of Africa are seeking to find their way.

More and more Americans are beginning to realize the importance of Africa in the world sphere. It is no longer the Dark Continent of the travelogs, but truly a vast area of 11.7 million square miles, containing invaluable natural resources, and serving as a home of some 220 million people. I have every hope that the peoples of Africa will continue to be oriented toward the free world. Their ties of blood and culture are strong with our country despite the distance and the disparity of our respective natural development.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SPEECH ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS BY SENATOR MANSFIELD AT ANNUAL DINNER OF ALUMNI ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK UNIVERSITY LAW SCHOOL

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, my distinguished colleague, Senator MIKE MANSFIELD, made an address of worldwide significance in regard to foreign affairs at the annual dinner of the Alumni Association of the New York University Law School on April 8, 1959.

Montana is justly proud of her distinguished junior Senator. His great ability and attainments in the national legislative field have not only been recognized in Montana for many years, but here in the U.S. Senate by his designation as majority whip. Senator MANSFIELD is equally qualified in the field of international affairs. His approach to world problems is always well reasoned and sound.

In his address to New York University Law School, Senator MANSFIELD has outlined the changing nature of our problems and our dealings with the Soviet Union. He has urged that the United States approach negotiations with the Soviet with flexibility and with new ideas. He has urged that the United States not maintain a cold, rigid, and consequently brittle, position that could lead only to intensification of the cold war and even to hostilities.

So that the Members of the Senate may have the full text of his splendid address available to them, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH BY SENATOR MIKE MANSFIELD, DEMOCRAT, MONTANA, DELIVERED AT ANNUAL DINNER OF ALUMNI ASSOCIATION OF LAW SCHOOL, NEW YORK UNIVERSITY, NEW YORK CITY, HELD AT WALDORF-ASTORIA HOTEL, NEW YORK CITY, WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 8, 1959

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS

Justice Frank, Father O'Reilly, President Newsom, Senator Murray, Judge Valenti, distinguished justices, Commissioner Kennedy, members of the bar, and, if there are any here, other than myself, fellow laymen, I feel overwhelmed by the generous words of introduction. I am deeply grateful for them even though they are undeserved. The introduction was so kind as to suggest that, for a moment, Justice Frank had doffed his judicial robes in order to serve as counsel for the defense.

I appreciate his summation on my behalf more than I can say. For, in the midst of this distinguished legal gathering, I am in need of counsel. You see, as a layman, I share the layman's sense of awe in the presence of the law, or, perhaps, I should say, in the presence of lawyers. That may seem strange to you since, as you know, I have been helping to make laws for almost 20 years. It is one thing, however, to write the law. It is another to be face to face with those who can tell you in no uncertain terms what it is that you have written.

Besides Justice Frank, I believe there are others in the room to whom I can turn for counsel in my predicament, or, at any rate, whom I can call as character witnesses. There is, for example, the Honorable JAMES MURRAY, known to you, his New York University colleagues, as JIM, and to his fellow Montanans as BIG JIM. To me, he is and always will be the senior Senator from Montana. His contributions to humanity, to the Nation, and to the State of Montana have been many and great. His example and his guidance, to me, personally, have set such high ideals of public service that I can only grope for them and do the best I can to measure up to them.

Present here, too, is your outstanding police commissioner, Stephen P. Kennedy, who, I hope, will also serve as a character witness on my behalf. He can tell you, at least, that my name is not on the New York City police blotters. Commissioner Kennedy, I understand, has been named man of the year by your association. You know him as a great administrator of the police force of this complex metropolis. In my opinion there is no more difficult job in the world.

Personally, I should like to nominate Commissioner Kennedy as "international policeman of the year." I make the suggestion on the basis of my experience as a U.S. delegate to the United Nations General Assembly last year. Few of us realize or appreciate the wonderful job his force does in protecting the hundreds of foreign delegates who converge on this city for United Nations meetings, as well as their permanent mission here the year round. The New York City police perform a great service for the entire Nation in insuring the safety of these foreigners, whether we happen to like them or not. I think it is high time that Washington recognize this service and give some consideration to reimbursing the city of New York for the cost of this special police protection. That is the least we can do in return for the great contribution which New York makes to the international reputation and responsibilities of the entire Nation.

I should like to round out my counsel for defense by including in it another Montanan, Russell Nyles, the dean of your law school. To you, I believe he is known as "Poppa." To Montana, he is the dean of one of the great law schools of the country. When I began my own formal higher education, somewhat belatedly—I was 24 years old when I entered college—I had already heard of Dean Nyles because he was, and is, considered one of Montana University's outstanding graduates.

Finally, may I enter, in support of my presence here, tonight—a layman among lawyers—the plea that I am no ordinary layman but rather one with a prior claim to your acceptance. You see, I am a native-born New Yorker. Not only that but I was born very close to the site of the citadel of your society, that is, just off Washington Square. As a matter of fact, it is not at all impossible that I was born on the very spot where the new New York University Law School now stands. May I add, however, that I was not more than 3 or 4 years old before my father and mother had the good sense to pack me up and move me on to Montana.

Having established, I hope, my right to be here, let me proceed, in all seriousness, to a very serious subject. I want to talk with you tonight about Germany, about the prospects for peace or war in the situation which is developing in that country.

PROSPECTS IN GERMANY

In a few weeks a conference on Germany will be held in Geneva. It will be a conference of the foreign ministers of the Western nations and the Soviet Union. Free Germans of the West and Communist Germans of the East will be present. This conference is likely to be followed by another in the summer—a conference of President Eisenhower and other Western heads of state and Mr. Khrushchev.

We may expect that these two principal conferences will be supplemented by a great deal of diplomatic exchange and other contacts at all levels and in various combinations. There will be meetings among representatives of the Communist nations. There will be meetings among representatives of the free nations. There will be meetings between the free and the Communist. In short, we are in for talk, a great deal of talk in the days ahead.

PROCEDURES AND THE COMING CONFERENCES

We may anticipate that there will be disagreements—serious disagreements—even before the stage of negotiating the problems of peace is reached. There will be arguments over who should talk and who should not; whether talk should begin at the summit and echo down to the base or begin at the base and rise up to the summit. Some of these arguments, indeed, have already taken place. There will be others.

Let me say that I appreciate the importance of these preliminaries. The manner in which they are dealt with will have an effect on the prospects for peace. It is important that procedural questions be discussed fully. It is equally important, however, that they be discussed with one object in view—the facilitating of sound agreements for peace. Procedural questions are not or ought not to be wrangled over for the purposes of face-saving, propaganda, or the evasion of responsibilities. Let us recognize, by all means, that procedural questions are important. But let us recognize, too, that the basic procedural problem which confronts us is not who talks with whom and when. Rather, it is: What kind of talk is likely to produce meaningful agreement?

I believe it is reasonable to say that decent men and women—in Russia or in Poland no less than in the United States or the United Kingdom—are not interested in propaganda conferences or face-saving conferences. They are not interested in conferences which merely restate platitudes on the virtues of peace. They are interested in conferences which will get on with the business of peacemaking. They will expect of those who participate in these conferences less concern with the problem of saving face and more with the problem of saving civilization. They will pray for the success of these conferences wherever they meet, whoever may participate in them, whenever they are held.

OBJECT OF THE COMING CONFERENCES

When we speak of praying for the success of these conferences, we ought to have clearly in mind some concept of what we mean by success. Do we mean the kind of success which characterized the Geneva Conference in 1955? That Conference produced pleasant generalizations on the virtues of peace. A year later, however, we were back to business as usual, to the business of propaganda war and cold war. Now, 4 years after Geneva, we are without tangible achievements for peace. On the contrary, we are entering the most critical period in international relations since the Korean conflict.

Nor can we mean, when we pray for the success of these impending conferences, peace at any price. I do not believe the people of this Nation are prepared to sacrifice the future of their children in freedom for a moment of surcease from the pressure and tensions of life today on the brink of war.

No; I do not think we mean either of these alternatives when we say that we pray for the success of these conferences. I believe that we mean we hope for progress toward sensible agreements which will permit us to live and to let live, which will substitute competition in the realm of ideas and human achievement for competition on the battlefields, which will reduce the dangers of hostility among nations now glaring at each other across the black and bottomless pit of nuclear war. In short, we hope for agreements which promise some measure of stability for all mankind. We hope for agreements which will reduce the likelihood of armed conflict not only for today but for tomorrow and tomorrow. We hope for agreements which at least will begin to remove the residual injustices of World War II and its chaotic aftermath—injustices which, almost 15 years later, still press upon the backs of the peoples of many lands.

It is one thing to hope, in these terms, for the success of the coming conferences. It will be another to bring the hope to fruition. In international aspirations as in human aspirations, there is, inevitably, a gap between what we would like to do and what we are likely to be able to do.

The best chance of closing this gap, I believe, lies in approaching the impending conference with neither an excess of expectation nor with a cynical disbelief in their prospects of yielding anything constructive. What we need most in the days and weeks of talk which lie ahead is a clear and specific understanding of what it is that we want to bring about by these talks. We need a positive purpose which is adjusted to the realities of the existing situation in the world. We need ideas, new ideas, realistic ideas, which may help us to realize this purpose. It is important to remember in this connection that in the realm of international negotiation, the search for all is likely to yield nothing. The intelligent pursuit of what is reasonable may lead to more than we dared hope for.

THE NEED FOR THE CONFERENCES

Before we can clarify our purposes in the impending conferences, it is essential to appreciate the origins of these conferences. Why, we may well ask ourselves, is it necessary to talk with the Russians at all at this time, about Germany or any other subject for that matter? Has Mr. Khrushchev compelled the West to meet? Are we merely responding, reluctantly, reticently, to a changing whim in Soviet policy? Are we going into these conferences as though they were some evil Communist brew which we have no choice but to drink?

If that is our concept, if we see the origins of the conferences in these terms then I say, in all seriousness, that it is preferable not to go into them. We do not have to drink of the cup that is proferred. If we can conceive of our participation in these conferences as nothing more than a submission to Soviet threats or an entrapment by Soviet blandishments then I say again it is better not to go into them; it is better, not to delude ourselves.

Seen in these terms, the conferences will yield nothing worth the having. They may produce propaganda. They may produce platitudes. They may save faces. They will not produce a worthwhile basis for durable peace in Germany and Europe or anywhere else. On the contrary, they may rot even further the shabby platform which now supports the present dangerous international dance on the edge of destruction.

I want to suggest, however, that we need not appraise these coming conferences as merely a Western jump to the snap of the Soviet diplomatic whip. There is another way of looking at them. Some of us have looked at them in this other fashion for a long time, long before Mr. Khrushchev's recent maneuvers at Berlin. In this other light, the origins of these conferences are seen to lie in very different soil. Seen in this other light, the need for these talks, is a need that has long existed. For some of us who have advocated an American initiative for peace, it is a source of regret that we of the West have appeared to wait for a prompting from the East to begin these talks.

For us, the origins of these talks do not rest in Mr. Khrushchev's recent statements. The need arises elsewhere. It arises from the vast changes which have taken place in the world during the past decade; more particularly the changes which have taken place on the European continent; specifically, the changes which have taken place in Germany.

Let me point out some of these changes. Think for a moment of the monumental revolution in technology alone. In scarcely a decade, this technological revolution has reposed in the hands of men, at once, the power to light new stars in the heavens and to put out the lights of civilization on earth. That change alone has a profound significance for all humanity and endless implications for the foreign policies of every nation.

There have been other changes of not much less significance. We have witnessed in Russia in the space of a decade the passing of the era of Stalin; the recovery from the devastation of invasion and the rapid development of an advanced science and technology. We have witnessed, during this decade, vast upheavals within China and great transitions in the belt of nations—old nations and new—stretching half way round the world, from one end of the Afro-Asian world to the other. A billion and a half people have been torn loose from ancient moorings. These changes, too, have a profound significance for us, for the Russians, for the entire world.

In Europe, we have witnessed the comeback of a continent. Its people, in the West, at least, are no longer the stunned, war-numbed masses, which the liberating allied armies found wandering in bewildered impotence, in the midst of the rubble and overwhelming devastation of World War II. The Europeans have revitalized themselves, their economies, their political life. What is true of all Western Europe is emphatically true of Western Germany. An old generation has recovered. A new generation has come of age, changed with new vigor, new ideas, seeking new and constructive directions.

Can we suppose for a moment that these changes—these vast, unmeasurable changes and others do not compel changes in the relationships among nations? It is obvious that they do; they alter the facts of the situation with which the policies of this Nation, of all nations must deal if there is to be peace. Obviously, policies devised years ago, in another setting, cannot serve in the new situation which is evolving.

It is true that there have been some adjustments in the policies of all the principal nations to these changes. The question is: are these adjustments sufficient; are they coming in good time? Unless they are, not only is there little likelihood of a genuine peace being achieved but even the unspoken truces which have, heretofore, cushioned the principal points of friction in the world, are endangered. In the light of the worldwide transition of the past decade these unstable truces must either be altered by reason, by negotiation, sufficiently and in time, or, sooner or later, they will give way in conflict.

One of these points of friction, of possible conflict, exists in Germany. In fact, it extends throughout Central Europe. It is in this region that the military power of the two nations capable of ultimate war—the United States and the Soviet Union—are in the closest of contact. It is in this region, too, that most of the residual injustices of World War II are to be found.

For years now an unspoken agreement, an unstable truce has existed in this region. The shaky peace has rested on the avoidance of military incidents which go beyond the point of no return. It has rested on the acquiescence of the Germans, no less than the Western Powers and the Soviet Union in a divided Germany and a divided Berlin. It has rested upon the acquiescence of ourselves and the peoples of Eastern Europe in Soviet military domination of that region.

For years this has been the reality, despite talk of unification of Germany, despite talk of liberation of Eastern Europe, despite Soviet threats and blandishments.

It has been a tolerable, if not exactly, a comfortable arrangement. What we have failed to reckon with, however, or at least to reckon with adequately, is that the pressures of change in the world and, particularly, in Europe and Germany itself, have been building around this point whether we have realized it or not, whether or not we and the Russians chose to look at this reality. We have waited a long time to face this fact. I deeply hope that we are prepared to face it now and that it is not too late to face it now, in peace.

This, then, is the perspective in which the coming conference ought to be seen. I repeat they may be worse than useless if they are regarded merely as an unavoidable Western response to a Soviet initiative. They can be a godsend if they are recognized by all concerned as an opportunity to begin to replace the outmoded truce in Germany and central Europe with something more durable, something better for all concerned.

If the beginnings of a stable peace in Germany and central Europe are to be drawn from the impending conferences, there will have to be a rethinking of many aspects of the policies which the Soviet Union has pursued in that region, which the nations of the West have pursued. There will have to be give and take, a quid pro quo, concession to match concession. We cannot, at this point, see the details of agreements but the signposts along the road to a rational settlement are beginning to emerge.

1. At Berlin, for example, we can see that there can be no one-sided withdrawal of the forces of freedom from the Western part of the city. That does not mean, however, that there can be no change in the status of that city. It means only that any change in the status of that city must be a total change, which leaves freedom in no less an advantageous position than communism. Perhaps this total change can be brought about through the interim neutralization of both free and Communist Berlin with the help of the United Nations and under its supervision, with free access to the city by all routes guaranteed by that body until Berlin becomes once again the capital of a united Germany.

2. There needs to be at least the beginnings of the beginning on the problem of German unification, with Germans of East and West contributing more, much more, than they are now doing to the solution of the problems of unification.

3. There must be some evidence of a willingness on the part of the Communists in control of the Eastern part of Germany to accept and to extend the principles of the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights. In particular, there must be a beginning of the restoration of political rights to all in that zone, rights which can be exercised freely and not under the threat of terror.

4. There must be a willingness to accept the reality that Germany's peaceful ties with Western Europe cannot be ended except by the will of the German people themselves.

5. There must be an equal willingness, however, to accept the premise that the extent and nature of German rearmament is not sacrosanct, that it can be limited or altered in the interests of the security of all nations.

6. There must be a willingness to accept the premise that the numbers of foreign troops, and the nature of their armaments in Germany and in central Europe is subject to negotiation on a give-and-take basis. To this end, the Eden and Gaitskill plans and the Rapacki plan all merit the closest consideration, provided, I repeat, provided that there are reasonable agreements in the Geneva conferences on the control of nuclear testing and the prevention of surprise attack.

May I say that the points which I have just enumerated are not new. Others have alluded to them. I believe that, in part at least, they represent the direction in which the Secretary of State was trying to lead the Western nations when he was stricken. I reiterate tonight what I have said many times, that his illness represents a most serious loss to the cause of freedom and of peace and that I hope deeply that he will recover in time to make his advice, his leadership, and his guidance available.

May I say, too, that the points which I have just enumerated as signposts of peace are drawn from the same nine points which I made in a speech in the Senate 2 months ago and have repeated in whole or in part on several occasions since that time. I have not altered those points in any significant way because I believed then, and I believe now, that they indicate the way in which the search for a more durable peace—a worthwhile peace—is likely to prove most fruitful. The discussion which has followed my remarks in the Senate and elsewhere has been very useful. It has helped to clarify and to elaborate. Most of all, it has helped, I believe, to break the moratorium on new thought on this critical problem of the Nation. This thought in connection with the German crisis is coming before, not as in Korea, after, the crisis was upon us.

STRENGTHENING THE PROSPECTS FOR PEACE

Let me consider, in conclusion, the prospects for peace in Germany and what can be done to strengthen them. I think it is essential to emphasize that peace in Germany depends not on us alone, not on the Western nations alone, but on the Soviet Union as well. If the Soviet Union does not seek peace, then there will not be peace. It does not follow, however, that even if the Soviet Union does seek a durable settlement in Germany and central Europe that one will automatically emerge. Peace is a two-way street, and we are on one side of it.

We will endanger our own position and the prospects of peace if we become obsessed with the fascinating game of interpreting the ever-changing charades of Soviet policy. These charades may mean peace. They may mean war. They may mean neither peace nor war. We can only assume as certainty that at any given time they can mean any of these possibilities and that we must be prepared to face any of them. What we can do, beyond this, if we would increase the prospects of peace, is to get clear in our own minds why it is that we stand firm in Germany, as indeed we must. We stand firm, not as an end in itself. We stand firm in order to go forward toward a durable peace. If there is to be peace, we, no less than the Russians, shall have to put aside the dangerous toys of the propaganda war, and the chips on the shoulders of the cold war. We shall have to put aside both the grins and the frowns. We shall have to examine and to examine deeply the problems of peace and see what it is possible to do with them in the light of the new realities of the situation which confronts us. We shall have to apply to these altered problems, new ideas. We shall have to bring to these problems a renewed determination to respond to the deepest desire of our own people and of all mankind, a new dedication to the search for progress toward a durable peace.

GOVERNMENT INVENTORY OF FOODSTUFFS—FOOD FOR THE NEEDY

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, some of us hoped, after the depression of the early thirties, that there would never again come a time in America when there would be large masses of hungry people and mounting surpluses of food.

Such a time has come again. The Department of Agriculture has inventories of more than $8 billion of foodstuffs; unemployment, according to official estimates, is in excess of 4½ million, but real unemployment, including part-time unemployed, is well over 5 million. Hundreds of thousands of the unemployed are without compensation of any sort and they and their families are in dire need.

In my judgment, the Department of Agriculture has abundant funds and authority to provide food for the needy. The Department has recently admitted in private communication that it does not know if it is using all of its authorities to provide food for hungry people. I know that a number of my colleagues are studying bills to make distribution of surplus foods mandatory on the Secretary of Agriculture. In view of the situation, I believe that the Senate would be interested in a statement recently released by Mr. Albert Whitehouse, director of the industrial union department of the AFL–CIO. I request unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 24, 1959.

Albert Whitehouse, director, industrial union department, AFL–CIO, today called upon Congress to review and investigate the workings of the Federal surplus foods program.

Whitehouse pointed out that continuing large-scale unemployment is causing distress across the country, that some 5 million persons are now dependent upon public assistance programs, that millions of children now lack adequate school lunches, and that other millions of low-income Americans suffer as the result of inadequate diets.

"We are sitting on mountains of food," Whitehouse said. "By this July, Federal warehouses will be bursting with over $9 billion worth of so-called surplus. The costs of storage alone for this food now are mounting up to a billion dollars a year.

"In view of the needs of the American people, this situation makes no sense at all. The unemployed of the Nation, the Nation's underprivileged schoolchildren, those on public assistance, and other low-income groups can make good use of this so-called surplus.

"If the billion dollars that will go to defray storage costs this year were spent on getting milk, meat, dried fruits, and other foods to those in need, a big dent could be made in our mountain of surplus. Unless intelligent action is taken, there is little hope that the surplus will do other than rot, since there is little chance that market conditions will change.

"Year by year, the surpluses grow. This year, because of the Benson flexible farm crop system, a bumper crop of corn will result, with millions more bushels in surplus. Last year, an additional 300 million bushels of wheat were declared surplus. These grains could mean bread and meat to millions of Americans now denied adequate diets.

"A recent newspaper survey showed 31,000 families living in want in the District of Columbia. Another survey showed that 7,000 District of Columbia schoolchildren suffer from malnutrition. In the Nation's Capital, many families are dependent largely upon the woefully inadequate Federal surplus program for sustenance. The surplus food handout in the District now amounts to a sparse monthly allotment of flour, cornmeal, rice, and powdered milk.

"This situation is repeated monotonously across the country. In many areas there has been no meat, fats, oils, eggs, dried fruits, or other essentials for at least 2 years. Although cheese continues to be in plentiful supply, it has been removed from the surplus list. Peanuts are now in surplus, but no effort appears to be at hand to process them into needed oils or peanut butter.

"Much of the trouble is due to the nature of the law under which the surplus food program operates. This law hitches a vital relief program to the vagaries of the agriculture market as interpreted by the Department of Agriculture.

"Far more could be done to stabilize farm prices by reducing our senseless surpluses through the food program than by the kind of flexible farm support policies now being pursued. Surplus foods could be distributed to those in need—the jobless, those on public assistance, the aged and infirm in institutions, and the schoolchildren—without detriment to private enterprise. For the longer pull, all will gain from a surplus food program geared to need instead of the market.

"Even today's inadequate program is not being properly carried out. Our economy-minded Secretary of Agriculture has succeeded in driving up the budget of his Department to an all-time high of $7 billion. In the interests of his own kind of economy, the Secretary last year turned back to the Treasury unspent some $83.5 million of surplus food funds, although 1958 was a recession year in which need was greater than at any time since before World War II.

"Under the law, the Secretary of Agriculture had $220 million allocated for his surplus food program last year, but spent only about $140 million. He also had $300 million of unobligated balances carried forward from previous years. In view of the funds at hand and the needs of American citizens, the performance of the Department has been one of callous indifference, to say the least.

"Congress should undertake a full-scale investigation of the surplus food program with a view to improving the law and its administration. An adequate diet is the right of every American family. There is no excuse for malnutrition in the United States, especially at a time when bumper crops threaten to outrun storage space."

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY—ADDRESS BY ELMO ROPER

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on March 24 Mr. Elmo Roper, the distinguished public opinion analyst, was asked to speak before the Baltimore League of Women Voters on the challenging topic, "Well, what broad general policies would you lay down if you were Mr. Dulles?"

I have just read Mr. Roper's speech. I believe it to be one of the best statements on the desirable course of U.S. foreign policy that I have ever seen.

Mr. Roper makes the case for a United Nations police force, for new relations with those areas of Asia and Africa which contain the oldest cultures and the newest nations in the world. He bluntly states the alternatives in policy regarding relations with Communist nations, and the great possibilities open to the free world if we move closer to Europe economically and politically.

Achievement of this latter goal could, in my opinion, be quickened by approval of Senate Concurrent Resolution 17, cosponsored by the distinguished senior Senators from Minnesota, Tennessee, Kentucky, and New Jersey [Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. COOPER, and Mr. CASE]. This resolution provides for an Atlantic Exploratory Convention.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert Mr. Roper's speech in the body of the RECORD. In so doing I express the hope, which I believe will find favor on both sides of the aisle, that greater attention be given, by the U.S. Government, to the recommendations of Mr. Roper and to the talents he could bring to bear in the field of foreign relations.

There being no objection the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH BY ELMO ROPER BEFORE THE BALTIMORE LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS

I have not come here tonight with a readymade solution for the Berlin crisis. I have come here with some thoughts about how to live in a world of chronic crisis, and more specifically, about the requirements of a modern foreign policy for the United States.

The issue facing our generation is simple: it is whether or not we shall survive. If we do achieve such a basic, primitive goal we shall need to call into use all the subtlety, foresight, wisdom, and inventiveness that is latent in our civilization. In order to save what is precious and essential in that civilization we must cut out ruthlessly those parts of our thought and behavior which have ceased to be relevant to the circumstances in which we live and have begun to threaten our chances for continued growth and life. We must give up cherished habits and prejudices or we will find ourselves, at best out of step, at worst out of existence, in a world where the once powerless are becoming more powerful each year.

I suppose, today, there is no longer any need to prove that this is so. The evidence lies all around us. We have invented weapons of unprecedented power and at the same time have found ways of delivering these weapons quickly on target, through our conquest of space—inner and to some extent outer. The scientists of the world, responding to the requests of their sovereign governments, have found a way to destroy those governments in a matter of hours. Military victory has become an obsolete concept in a world within pushbutton distance of nuclear destruction. The winner in the next big war will be that nation which kept 25 percent of its total population alive for 12 hours longer than did its rival. Yet, wearily, automatically, we go on with the futile race for monopoly of the capacity for atomic terror—although no such monopoly can ever again exist. We don't seem to know what else to do. Faced with a rival we cannot trust and with whom we have not been able to come to terms, perhaps we have no choice but to continue trying to keep abreast both of the Russians and of the latest refinements of nuclear science. But surely no one is kidding himself that any longer can we buy security with our millions so expended. No one in his right mind is. Military security, like military victory, is a phrase from a dead language, a language which was struck forever dumb 13 years ago at Hiroshima.

Because the traditional military meanings have been destroyed, it is now necessary to find other ways to approach what, if we cannot call it security, we can think of at least as a diminution of insecurity in today's harrowed world.

What we must do is rethink the bases of our relations with the rest of the world. Actually the last two decades have already brought about a revolution in America's understanding of her relations with the rest of the world. The United States was until comparatively recently Europe's stepchild, borrowing culture as well as money from the Old World—that is, when she felt the need to go abroad at all, for most of the time she was quite content to stay at home, exploring her vast undeveloped natural wealth and settling her own frontier. Busy with our own growth we knew little about the outside world and seemed to care less. Even as our fortunes became more and more deeply interwoven with those of the world "beyond the water's edge," we turned our face away from the full implications of this fact, unwilling to become embroiled with the troubles of what seemed to us an alien world. We all remember, with not too much pride, how stubbornly we resisted this embroilment throughout the 1930's and in the end how little choice we had. In a sense, we might be likened to children, unwilling to grow up, reluctant to leave off the happy games of youth to face the more serious and complex involvements of adulthood. But a child grows up, whether he likes it or not, and one day we woke up to find that was just what had been going on. We found that America is no longer in the posture of a helpless child, surrounded by all-knowing, all-powerful adults, but a Nation in its prime, surrounded by others whose time of great power is either past or yet to come—and one strong and implacable enemy. And we are so deeply involved with these other nations—all of them—that there will never again be any way out for us but to face up to the full implications of that fact.

How we got there is no secret. We reached this peak of strength because we have a unique inventive and business genius that enabled us to transform our abundant natural resources into the equally abundant products of man's technology. We reached this deep involvement with the rest of the world, partly through the stepping up of transportation and communication through that same technology so that places once surrounded by a romantic aura of distance now are within harshly unromantic bomber range. But all this is less due to transportation itself than to what transportation has made possible: an unprecedented flow of international trade. It is trade that binds our world together and makes it forever impossible for us to return to a simpler, self-sufficient past.

I don't suppose there are many of us left who would proclaim that the United States has the ability to go it alone in the matter of the supplies we need to keep our standard of living at the level it is. Yet, I think we still tend to overrate the extent to which we can rely on our own resources to keep us the richest and most powerful nation in the world. Here are some sobering facts about our resources from the report made in 1952 by the President's Materials Policy Commission, headed by William S. Paley—and incidentally, one of the most penetrating reports of our time.

"The United States' appetite for materials is Gargantuan—and so far, insatiable. At midcentury, the Nation uses up over 2½ billion tons of materials each year to keep itself going and support its standard of living. With a population of 151 million, each person consumes, on an average, 18 tons a year. He uses about 14,000 pounds of fuel for heat and energy—warming houses and offices, running automobiles and locomotives, firing factory boilers, smelting metals, and hundreds of other tasks. He uses 10,000 pounds of building materials—lumber, stone, cement, sand and gravel, and so on—800 pounds of metals—(winnowed from 5,000 pounds of ores). He eats nearly 1,600 pounds of food; this, together with cotton and other fibers for clothing, and with pulpwood for paper, and other miscellaneous products, mounts up to 5,700 pounds of agricultural materials. In addition he uses 800 pounds of nonmetallics, such as lime fertilizer and chemical raw materials.

"Such levels of consumption, climaxing 50 years of phenomenal economic progress, levy a severe drain on every kind of resource we have: minerals, forests, soil and water. In the first 50 years of the 20th century, as population doubled and our total national output reached five times the 1900 level, the stream of raw materials increased in volume and value until, in 1950, it was worth two and one-half times as much (in constant dollars) as it was in 1900. In 1950 we were taking from the earth 2½ times more bituminous coal, 3 times more copper, 3½ times more iron ore, 4 times more zinc, 26 times more natural gas, 30 times more crude oil than in the year 1900. The quantity of most metals and mineral fuels used in the United States since the First World War exceeds the total used throughout the entire world in all of history preceding 1914."

Then the report goes on to say, "This vast drain, greater today than yesterday, and inescapably greater tomorrow than today, upon resources that cannot be renewed has become the most challenging aspect of our present-day economy. A ton of ore removed from the earth is a ton gone forever; each barrel of oil discovered means one less remaining * * * The time has clearly passed when we can afford the luxury of viewing our resources as unlimited and hence taking them for granted. In the United States, the supplies of the evident, the cheap, the accessible, are running out. The plain fact is that we have skimmed the cream of our resources as we now understand them. * * * At the start of the century we produced some 15 percent more raw materials than we consumed (excluding food); by mid-century we were consuming 10 percent more materials than we produced. We had completed our slow transition from a raw materials surplus nation to a raw materials deficit nation."

So there we are. The Nation with the highest standard of living in the world and greatly dependent on the rest of the world to maintain it. We are not used to thinking this way about our position in the world. We are used to thinking of our own resources as limitless, and in recent years it has been easy to see the rest of the world as either an outstretched hand, as in the case of our European friends and the underdeveloped countries of Asia, or an outstretched fist, in the case of Russia and her Communist-controlled bloc of nations. But it is true, nevertheless. However strong we are now, however creative and inventive and humanly resourceful we continue to be, the plain fact is that we need the world just as it needs us. Our choice is no longer whether to mingle in world affairs or to leave them alone; it is between more and less intelligent, more and less constructive ways of playing our part in that world. I want to talk today about what I consider to be some of the more intelligent ways of participating in that world.

It is essential that we redefine our relations with the three groups of nations into which the world can be roughly divided: (1) The Communist and Communist-controlled nations, (2) the underdeveloped existing nations and the would-be nations of Asia and Africa who have tended to avoid definite alinement with power blocs outside their own regions, and (3) our accustomed allies, the friendly and democratic nations who, for the most part, are located in the Western part of the world.

Finally, (4) we must do some fresh thinking about the U.N. and the role it has to play in maintaining and solidifying peace.

1. First of all, we need to accept the fact that Russia and the Communist world will not disappear—except possibly arm and arm with us—will not stop trying to win over other parts of the world, and may not change its character except slowly. And at the same time we should keep in the backs of our minds that old truism that the only thing certain is change. In that, there is hope for man. Meanwhile, we must deal with Russia on a realistic basis. Military competition is a blind alley—although it may be an essential one. Russia has already seen this and has engaged in powerful campaigns to win friends and influence people on an economic, political, and ideological basis. Much can be done within the framework of peaceful coexistence and Russia has been quick to see and take advantage of this.

We may not like Russian imperialism, or the police state concept or the callousness of so-called communism, but for the present, we shall have to find a way of coexisting with them, for there is no alternative but nonexistence. What we must get out of is being in a position where we act only negatively, defensively, trying to fight Communist advances, minimize its gains, but offering nothing positive of our own. Up to now, communism has been on the march, while democracy has been, more often than not, on the limp.

Right now we are going through a particularly severe crisis in our relations with Russia, the issue being Berlin. We have met the latest Russian threats, in the main, with intransigence. I think we need to find a way to inject a greater measure of flexibility into our approach to this, as to other situations.

The answer may or may not be a summit meeting, but through some means a way must be found to coexist in a less risky and dangerous manner than we have been doing. One can get dizzy, one can lose his sense of proportion, one can even fatally lose his balance, when forced to live regularly on the brink of a precipice.

I should like to talk a little here about our relations—or perhaps I should say, our lack of relations—with Communist China, because our attitude toward that country provides an excellent case study with which to exhibit the inadequacies of our general approach to international relations. And this inadequacy is present, mind you, in our attitude toward a country that more than one observer has called our number one challenge in the world today—even outstripping that of Soviet Russia.

Whenever the public is asked about Communist China, their answer is quick and definite: Red China should not be traded with, should not be recognized, should not be let into the U.N. In other words, in the minds of a large majority of Americans, the best attitude to take toward a nation which represents one-quarter of the world's population is to ignore it.

The public's attitude toward the Chinese Nationalists is more complex: Although few expect Chiang Kai-shek to return to power on the mainland, and although even fewer were ready to go to the defense of the disputed offshore islands last fall, Americans are favorable to the Nationalist leader by a 4 to 3 ratio.

On what are these sentiments based? In too few cases are they based on a knowledge of the real situation. Last fall, when the papers were full of the newly erupted crisis in the Formosa straits, we asked a national cross-section: "Do you happen to remember the names of the islands that the Communist Chinese forces have recently been bombarding?" At that time, only 52 percent could name Quemoy and only 30 percent could name Matsu.

The difference at that time in the opinions of the informed and the uninformed was great. People who couldn't identify either the islands under bombardment or the Secretary of Defense were extremely reluctant to see America fight over either the offshore islands or Formosa itself. At the same time, very few of them had any criticism of Eisenhower's handling of foreign affairs, although at that time he was advocating a rather militant policy in respect to Quemoy and Matsu. Nor did they have any particular criticism of Chiang Kai-shek—most of this relatively uninformed group thought rather highly of him—but wouldn't help defend him on Formosa.

Turning to the much smaller, informed group, we find that they are much more consistent. The vote on whether to fight, if necessary, at least for Formosa, is much closer—more evenly divided. (This group also rejected the idea of fighting over Quemoy and Matsu.) So is the vote of approval or disapproval of Eisenhower's handling of foreign affairs—many more of them disapproved. And these people had a lower opinion of Chiang and his chances to regain mainland power than did the less informed group—although they were at the same time more willing to come to his defense.

Obviously, the patterns of thought and feeling that underlay these two complexes of attitudes were quite different. For the uninformed group, opposition to a fight in the Formosa straits was a quick instinctive reaction, based on little or no knowledge of the actual situation. Their support for Eisenhower's handling of foreign affairs was also based on an emotional feeling about Eisenhower rather than any specific thing that he had done. Also with Chiang Kai-shek, these people were probably expressing a vague residue of the good feeling that was built up for Chiang by President Roosevelt and others during World War II, rather than any concrete information about the Nationalist leader.

Our popular attitude toward Red China, then—and our official policy has closely paralleled our popular attitude—has been uninformed, and consequently emotional. Our stance has fluctuated between that of an indignant preacher and a frightened ostrich—when we find we can't lecture unpleasant realities away we dig into the sand for a doze. Both attitudes are supremely unrealistic and can be supremely dangerous.

2. The second great part of the world with which we must enter into new relations is the so-called underdeveloped regions of Asia and Africa. The nations of the Near, Middle and Far East are in some ways the most sophisticated, knowing countries in the world, but in some ways they are the most naive. These regions contain the oldest cultures in the world and the newest nations. Their forms of government are different from ours; many are not democratic at all, in others democracy has put down only tentative roots which are not yet grounded in the essential soil of universal education and a people free enough from the day-to-day struggle for physical survival to think beyond the hope of bread and shelter.

These are countries with great resources which have only begun to be developed and utilized. When they are, the world will be richer and safer for it. Richer, because we shall all benefit from their increased capacity for exporting and their increased economic self-sufficiency. Safer, because as long as these nations live on a margin of survival, their economic insecurity will express itself also as psychological and political insecurity, and nations ridden by insecurity are bad bets for democracy—and peace. Until these nations get on a sound economic footing, they will be easy prey for the kind of demogoguery that seeks a scapegoat for their economic ills. This can take the form of leaders who stir up trouble with an outside and often imagined enemy to deflect attention from troubles at home, leaders whose most powerful weapon is their ability to involve great powers in the conflicts and tensions of small nations, thereby scaring the world into bribery and appeasement. Or it can take the dread form of surrender to the irrevocable tyranny of a Communist government, which closes the nation off from further movement toward freedom and economic progress.

The question with regard to these countries, then, is not whether or not to get them speedily on the way to fruitful development of their barely tapped resources. The question lies in how this should be done. I think the answer is that it should be done in a number of ways at one and the same time.

A good deal of it can be done by private investment. Probably a good deal more than is presently being done can be done by private investment. But however much can and should be done by private investment, there are some things it cannot do. In the least developed countries, much groundwork has to be laid before profitable enterprise can be begun. Surveying must be done, in order to discover the nature and amount of resources these countries have. Roads must be built, and railroads laid. Harbors and waterways must have the capacity to accommodate modern shipping. Electric power must be made available. In many of these countries rudimentary sanitation must be provided and basic educational and government facilities before there can be any real prospect of economic growth. Private capital from foreign countries should not be expected to do these jobs. But these jobs must be done, and in many cases they must be done before foreign capital can be put to any profitable use.

Again, the question, How? The first thought that comes to mind is that the United States should step in and fill the gap with a massive foreign aid program far greater than anything yet proposed. I don't think this is the case. We hear an awful lot about foreign aid, both pro and con. Should we have more of it, less of it, none of it? American aid is presented either as a panacea for the rest of the world's ills, or as a way of throwing our hard-earned wealth down a bottomless foreign drain. I think a lot of what has been said on this subject has simply not made very good sense.

I doubt that a sum such as we are now spending—about 1½ percent of our national income—could provide either a world panacea or the means to our national bankruptcy. However beguiling the idea may seem, what the world expects of the United States, and what we have to give the world, is not a magic wand that will instantly wave valleys into fruitfulness and dot the countryside with atomic energy plants. In saying this I am not talking against foreign aid or its present size.

But actually there are a number of ways, other than and often better than American foreign aid, to provide the needed capital. The World Bank is in a position or could be put in a position to provide loans for these purposes.

There are, of course, the various international agencies of the United Nations. And recently a new idea has been put forth which has been received with interest both in the West and in the Arab world—the idea of a regional bank for the Middle East.

Of course, one of the greatest barriers to trade, as we all know, lies in unnecessary or unnecessarily high tariffs. In the case of strategic materials, we are really cutting off our nose to spite our face when we erect substantial tariff barriers against these materials. Beside the immediate consequence of higher consumer prices, they have the effect of cutting down the supply of materials offered to us and discouraging production of these materials abroad. When high-cost domestic materials, in more or less scarce supply, are substituted for lower-cost more plentiful foreign supplies, we are robbing ourselves twice over, first, through the higher price we pay and, second, through unnecessary depletion of our own resources.

But, aside from the need to improve the economic condition of these countries—for their sake and ours—there is an equally pressing need for improvement in our non-economic relations with them.

It is a great irony—and could be a tragic one—that where Communists offer this part of the world ideas—primitive and distorted though they may be—the primary offering of the democratic world has been its machines. This is no small gift; machines can be a great liberating power. It is perhaps too much to expect to communicate fully ideas of parliamentary democracy to nations which are mostly illiterate and steeped in authoritarian tradition. But unless the American vision of a world of machine-supported ease is accompanied by a supplementary vision of human life lived in freedom and dignity, we will have added little, except to the world's unrest.

But giving can be a kind of tyranny, unless it is accompanied by a respect for and a desire to understand the needs of the recipient. We have too often judged other nations by our own standards, in ways that have been, at best, irrelevant and frequently offensive to the countries involved.

There are deep scars in these lands from centuries of oppression, much of which has been Western in origin. We must learn to stop supporting regimes that, to their awakened and impatient citizenry, represent the oppression of the past. We must give these people the confidence that we accept their drives toward national independence and their demand for a transfer of power and wealth to a broader base. We must not insist on nations who wish to be neutral actively joining our power bloc. We will make no friends this way. The words "If you're not for us, you're against us" have the quality more of vinegar than of honey.

3. When we turn to our European neighbors, we face, in many ways, quite different problems. These are the most developed nations in the world; they have been masters of their own destinies for quite some time. They are high on industrial capacity and low on natural resources. What is the nature of our relationship to Europe, and what should it be? It is a closer relationship than that with any other area in the world. It cannot help but be. Our cultures have the same roots; we have a common religion, art and literature in common, similar political institutions in that they are based on a belief in the dignity of man rather than the omnipotence of the state. From all this shared experience we have developed common values—a respect for the creative potential of the individual human being and a belief that this potential will best realize itself in an atmosphere of maximum liberty.

The days when national boundaries defined clear-cut, independent entities, the days when any nation, however mighty, could "go it alone" are past. This is evident to almost everyone, and the world is fast moving toward regional amalgamations. Perhaps in the best of all possible worlds this wouldn't be true. But it is folly for us to pretend it isn't true. Only in unity is there strength. Why do we watch with such trepidation the movement of the Arab world toward consolidation? Because we know that in such joining of forces lies a great deal of power, and in the case of a Nasser-led union we are afraid of the use of that power. But we must not forget that this is a power which is also available—and essential—to the Atlantic countries—if we have the courage to shuck off old political conceptions as we have, for example, shucked off the conception that every family must grow its own food and spin its own cloth—if we have the vision to create for today's conditions as well and with as much imagination as our forefathers did late in the 1700's.

Our leaders have stated again and again this overriding necessity. In 1957 President Eisenhower and British Prime Minister Macmillan issued a declaration of common purpose that said in part: "The concept of national self-sufficiency is out of date. The countries of the free world are interdependent, and only in genuine partership, by combining their resources and sharing tasks in many fields, can progress and safety be found."

The American people, too, see clearly this need for democratic unity: A few months after the 1956 Suez crisis we presented them with this question:

"Last year's crisis over the Suez Canal and the Middle East caused a great strain between the United States and its allies, England and France. Do you think it essential that we get this alliance fixed up, or merely desirable, or do you think it really doesn't matter whether we get it fixed up or not?"

This is how the public answered: Essential we get alliance fixed up, 66 percent; not essential, but desirable, 18 percent; really doesn't matter, 9 percent; don't know, 7 percent.

The history of the last few years is too often a story of Western disunity and shortsighted action because of the absence of a genuine collective policy and joint planning. Hasty improvisation has taken the place of thoughtful, long-range programs. All too often the Western Powers have seemed not to know what they wanted, and all too often they have given the impression that they want nothing more than to preserve the status quo throughout the world rather than facing emerging national and international realities.

Europe itself has seen the compelling need for unity in going full speed ahead with the development of a common market—and European national boundaries were transcended as long as 6 years ago when the Coal and Steel Community was established. Since then, the structure of the European coal and steel industry has been thoroughly overhauled. Since, as Jean Monnet put it, "the fresh wind of competition" blew "across the wide spaces of this common market" steel production has risen and prices have declined, without any diminution of profits.

What is the role of the United States in these developments? Is it enough for us to stand by, pleased and encouraging, giving our blessing to the new turn of European events? Should we welcome Europe as a potential third force in the field of world power? Should we assume that we could lose nothing and stand only to gain from the changing structure of Europe? I don't think we can make that assumption. In fact, I think we are making a great mistake if we do.

I think there are two kinds of reasons for looking at this development in a different way. The first kind is to ask, what do we have to lose by the ultimate formation of a united Europe, or the intermediate formation of a European Common Market? There are several possibilities. One is the possibility that Germany might come to dominate this united market and that one day Germany's aggressive impulses might come to the fore again—as it has done twice in my lifetime—and turn Europe's productivity against us. This does not seem very likely at the present time; but is Germany's friendship something we can take for granted, especially if long years of national division gradually create within Germans a deep resentment against the outside world and a determination to resume complete national identity at any cost? Another possibility is that, even if this does not happen, Europe itself could become unfriendly to us, through some happenstance of international politics, and with the same result as if Germany were dominant. A united Europe would feel stronger and more independent than its separate countries can possibly feel now and might tend to draw away from us through its own new self-confidence.

Another more immediate possibility is that this Common Market might discriminate against goods coming from the United States. While we expect and hope that the Common Market will not be used against us, but instead used to place tariffs at a reasonable level which will represent a compromise between the various tariff levels of the different countries involved, this is a theoretical possibility, at the very least, and one which has given American export firms some concern. Even if this did not happen now, it certainly is not intended now, there is no way of being sure that it might not happen in the future.

But there is another point of view from which we can look at these new developments of the European idea. Let us agree that it is a good idea, but then let us ask whether there is an even better idea. I think there is. I think if we will free our minds for a minute, we will see that all the advantages, and none of the disadvantages of the European idea would obtain if we expanded it into an Atlantic idea. With the United States on the outside, there will always be at least the risk that European power—or trade—can be turned against us. With the United States itself drawn closer into this common trading area, we can share in the benefits of an integrated economy and by our presence make those benefits for both our country and Europe incomparably greater.

We would have the advantage of reduced costs all around, as each country or region produced what it could produce most economically, and increased trade all around as markets expanded and became freer.

To the benefits of a more closely integrated economy, we might some day add the benefit of a common currency, thus working out one of the peskier problems of international business. We might be able to make it possible for people to move freely from areas where there was high unemployment to areas where there was a high demand for labor and skills.

As we moved closer to Europe economically, there would be an inevitable tendency to move closer politically. The administration of the closer economic relations would require closer integration of each government's policies. We already have the beginning of joint military planning. The benefits of coordinating our economic policies are substantial. Political and diplomatic coordination or integration by some means or other would be expected to follow. I believe this would be a development which would be of great benefit both to Europe and ourselves.

For better or worse, we are bracketed with Europe in the eyes of the rest of the world, and much will depend on whether we make it a fortunate or injurious bracketing. We can win the world's friendship only through the good example we set—in the just and humane relations we establish within our countries and with the rest of the world. Unlike the Communists, we cannot bypass the normal channels to good will by subversion and infiltration, conscienceless propaganda, and ultimately, if the circumstances seem propitious, the use of military force. True, we have our wealth, but we are too intelligent to suppose that, in the long run, purchased friendship would be much of a bulwark against the hatred of oppressed, perpetual "have not" peoples.

To put it in the simplest terms, if we established closer economic and political ties with Europe, we would be richer and stronger, and better able to win the struggle for survival our country and our civilization are now fighting in various degrees of cold, hot, and lukewarm war. Eventually as the areas of peace, stability, and democracy in the world enlarge, we might then be able to expand these ties to include other countries of the world. But this would take time; the kinds of ties that can be formed between long practicing democracies, and nondemocracies are quite different. With the democracies of Western Europe we could start at any time to push forward toward regional rather than national thinking that would liberate our economies and strengthen our position in the world.

It seems to me that the central question is not whether or not we should form closer ties with the European democracies but rather what is the best way of implementing the new interdependence which confronts us.

I suggest that the best people to find these new ways are not the professional diplomats, whose training is in the niceties of power relations, who are responsible to their governments and to policies and forms already established, who are understandably afraid that any truly imaginative proposal they might make would be regarded as committing the nation they represent. If a new solution is to be found, it is most likely to be discovered by free and unfettered minds, operating without restrictions or commitments to established positions and policies. I suggest that the best approach to this problem is to call a citizen's convention, where the best minds in our country, with the aids of political, economic, sociological, and financial experts, can meet with the best minds of those democracies with whom we will inevitably share a common fate, and together work out what seems to be the best way of securing close and continuing cooperation among the democracies. This group should include all shades of representative opinion on this subject and be strictly bipartisan—and strictly "top drawer." They should be as close as we can find to the Jeffersons, Madisons, and Hamiltons of an earlier critical period of our history. The plan they evolved would then be submitted to the legislative bodies of their respective countries for acceptance or rejection.

There is no use speculating on what recommendations would come out of such a conference. They might be very simple—or quite wide ranging. They might stop with the devising of a new political mechanism to insure a common foreign policy—or they might go much further. No one can predict what a group of the best brains in the free world would come up with—and certainly no one can, in advance, discount the possibility of workable answers. Surely the ability of man to devise new and better forms under which to govern himself did not end in 1789. Surely the faith of Jefferson and Lincoln and Wilson in the people and in their ability to solve their problems was not misplaced.

4. However, building these organic ties among the democratic nations will bear their best fruit only if we can at the same time establish more stability in the world around us. The very unity of all the democracies would do much for stability, but this is also a task in which all the nations of the world must cooperate and which should be tackled within the context of the U.N. A newly united bloc of Western democracies would be in a much better position to work toward the end of building this peace and stability, since with the minimizing of their internal problems and differences they could turn their attention outward to global problems. The U.N. may not be able to solve all the world's problems, but it is our chief hope of preventing those problems from exploding to destroy us.

The way to give the U.N. power to enforce peace is in the establishment of a permanent U.N. police force. The military action taken by Britain and the United States in Jordan and Lebanon last summer earned us few friends in that region. For too many, it once again evoked the ghosts of colonialist repression. Only a truly international force, dedicated solely to the preservation of peace, can act effectively in times of crisis. Surveys have shown that most people in this country approve of this idea, but we must work for the acceptance of such a force among the nations of the world.

As long as authoritarian government prevails throughout much of the world, there can be no genuine "world government." Still, as much as we can, we must work for the establishment of law between nations. The alternative is chaos.

One suggestion I should like to offer is that the bar associations of many countries meet and study the possibilities of strengthening and developing effective international law. Meanwhile, we must recognize the limitations of the U.N. as now constituted, work through it when we can, but face the power realities and try to unify the democracies by direct negotiations when only that will achieve the desired end.

5. We must work on many fronts. Much of what happens in the world is outside of our power and control. We should accept this and not feel that the outcome of every situation is on our shoulders. But where our actions can have effect, we must act intelligently and well.

I submit that one of the primary spheres of needed and possible action is in our relations with our fellow democracies. If we cannot establish a genuine working relationship with the countries with which we have most in common, we can hardly expect to succeed with countries whose attitude toward us is indifferent or suspicious or openly hostile.

Of course, there is an alternative. It may well be that there is no compelling reason for the survival of that rather peculiar and self-destructive species — mankind — which happens to inhabit this particular planet. That is an alternative. For those who reject that alternative—as I do—there is no road open but intelligent change.

PAN-AMERICAN DAY, 1959

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, yesterday was celebrated throughout the Western Hemisphere as Pan-American Day. It marked a significant day in the life of this region of the world and in man's eternal struggle to promote universal peace and prosperity.

On Pan-American Day we commemorate the historic event of April 14, 1890, when the 21 Republics of the Americas pooled their diplomatic and intellectual resources in an effort to promote the peace, progress, and prosperity of the Western Hemisphere.

The Pan American Union, which evolved from that event 69 years ago, is one of the oldest, and certainly one of the most successful, international organizations devoted to the improvement of relations between peoples and nations. It has contributed tremendously to strengthening the countries of the Western Hemisphere and insuring, so far as is possible, that they live in harmony and work cooperatively on common problems.

The Union was a forerunner of the Organization of American States, which was established in 1948, and which has played a major role in the continuing effort to coordinate the material and human resources of the American Republics for the happiness and profit of mankind.

In the face of great obstacles and in spite of repeated reversals, the OAS has continued to move forward. With enlightened leadership and unswerving dedication to the basic purpose of making justice and morality the measuring stick for relations between nations, great progress has been achieved.

The example of cooperative action among the nations of the Western Hemisphere has given the whole world food for thought. We have shown the world how it is possible for good neighbors to live together amicably and profitably.

In the days ahead, it is vital that the United States, in cooperation with our friends south of the border, continue to expand our joint economic and political and military projects. We must pursue with ever greater vigor the cultural exchanges which hold such promise for promoting mutual understanding and appreciation. I am convinced that greater people-to-people contacts, running the gamut from sports to music, from politics to engineering, hold the key to firming up the traditional bonds of friendship between the United States and our sister States of Latin America.

The potential for future growth and development in this hemisphere is almost unlimited. As each of us contributes to better understanding among the American Republics and peoples, through knowledge, through communication, through the people-to-people programs, through the numerous organizations devoted to fostering better relations, so we contribute to the future of the hemisphere and to the lives of those who come after us.

Pan-American Day, 1959, marked an important anniversary. The warmth and enthusiasm with which it was celebrated testifies eloquently to the determination of the peoples of the Americas to make the way of peace and cooperation the ultimate way of the world.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it is appropriate that the Senate take note today on Pan-American Day, at this time when our Government is greatly increasing its attention and aid to our Latin American neighbor nations.

On April 14, 1890, the first of the pan-American conferences was held here in Washington, and the Pan American Union was created to promote cooperation among the countries of our Western Hemisphere.

Now, in 1959, the importance of cooperation among the countries of North, Central, and South America is more vital than ever. All Western Hemisphere nations must constantly strive to develop a greater atmosphere of international peace and understanding, with friendship for democracy everywhere, in the Cordell Hull tradition. As the strongest nation of the hemisphere, the United States has the responsibility to act positively to promote such peace and understanding. The current efforts in Congress and in the administration to review our political and economic policies toward other Western Hemisphere nations holds out great hope that this country will help Latin American countries to greater national prosperity and freedom and to greater international influence for peace and freedom.

ADDRESS BY ARCHBISHOP JAMES OF GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH OF NORTH AND SOUTH AMERICA

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, several weeks ago the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] addressed the Senate and welcomed back to the United States his eminence Archbishop James, newly elected archbishop of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America. Archbishop James arrived the evening of March 31 and was enthroned the following day at the Greek Cathedral in New York City. Following that event there was an enthronement banquet at the Waldorf-Astoria. Attending this banquet were many leading religious figures representing the various faiths in our Nation. Representing the Government were Attorney General William P. Rogers, the Honorable George V. Allen, Director, USIA, and former Ambassador to Greece, and the Honorable Kevin McCann, as the personal representative of President Eisenhower.

At the enthronement banquet, Archbishop James delivered his first public address to his flock, and I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues this eloquent and moving statement.

Archbishop James is no stranger to the United States. Born in 1911, he came to the United States in 1939, and served as archdeacon of the Greek archdiocese and as professor at the archdiocese theological school.

He was ordained a priest in Boston on June 14, 1940, and served in this capacity at Hartford, Conn., in 1940–41. He was a preacher at the Holy Trinity Cathedral in New York from 1941 to 1942 and later in 1942 served for a brief period in St. Louis, Mo.

In 1942, he was appointed dean of the Cathedral of the Annunciation in Boston, and served in that capacity until 1954. For a brief period in 1954, prior to his election as a bishop, he served as director of the Holy Cross Orthodox Theological School in Brookline, Mass.

In December 1954, he was elected Bishop of Melita—Malta—and was assigned to the Archdiocese of Central and Western Europe. In March 1955, he was appointed representative of the Ecumenical Patriarchate at the World Council of Churches headquarters in Geneva. On April 4, 1956, he was elected a Metropolitan.

As the representative of the Ecumenical Patriarchate in the World Council of Churches, Archbishop James traveled extensively throughout the world and attended many ecclesiastical meetings and councils. During this time, he also visited the United States on several occasions and delivered lectures at Harvard University, Boston University and other institutions, and at several religious conferences. While in Boston, Archbishop James studied at the Harvard Divinity School and earned the degree of master of sacred theology—(S.T.M.). He is the author of many religious books and articles.

Archbishop James, who is an American citizen, has close ties with many of the religious groups in the United States, stemming from his association with the World Council of Churches and the National Council of Churches.

The Greek Archdiocese, which is under the jurisdiction of the ancient Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople, now headed by Patriarch Athenagoras I, has 1,150,000 communicants and 375 churches in the United States. It is the headquarters of the Greek Orthodox Church, which is the largest of the many Eastern Orthodox bodies in America.

I ask unanimous consent that the remarks of Archbishop James at the enthronement banquet be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES AT ENTHRONEMENT BANQUET, APRIL 1, WALDORF-ASTORIA, NEW YORK CITY

May I first thank you all, from the bottom of my heart, for this most kind and cordial reception, which you have accorded me upon my arrival. I interpret it as your expression of devotion and loyalty to our Ecumenical See and to the great Prelate, who honors that See today, our God-given Spiritual Leader, the Ecumenical Patriarch, Athenagoras 1st. I, therefore, accept your most touching expressions with a deeply grateful heart, and I magnify the name of the Lord.

I thank Him for you, who have grasped every possible opportunity in this, our beloved country, to develop yourselves into real and loyal and faithful citizens. You have progressed to an amazingly admirable degree, and have made both this country and your motherland and the Ecumenical Patriarchate especially proud of you.

Be blessed, therefore, my beloved brethren, and continue to grow in the Grace of God. This is the prayer, which his All Holiness, our Ecumenical Patriarch, offers daily for you. Continued spiritual and moral and social advancement and progress, is that which we all wish for you. I place myself at your service—beginning today—in order that I may help you walk in accordance with your high calling; to prove yourselves children of light and worthy daughters and sons of the Lord. Ahead of us lies a task of tremendous dimensions. That which we have accomplished is only the prologue—the preface to a chapter, which we must add to the history of America. We carry a challenging burden of historic responsibilities. We must discharge it in the best possible way, and thus prove ourselves worthy bearers of this Hellenic-Christian culture and civilization.

We are Americans. No less than any other Americans. Let us, therefore, make our role and contribution felt and appreciated in its true value. No field of activity and endeavor can be considered alien or unattainable by us. In the field of industry as well as in the field of the sciences, in the field of economics as well as in the field of education, in the field of civic endeavors as well as in the field of politics, in the field of athletics as well as in the field of literature and arts, in the field of religion as well as in the field of patriotism, we can, we must, distinguish ourselves in every way and bring joy and pride to the heart of America.

Our native land, the land in which our fathers and mothers and many of us were born, will experience no more blessed day, than that day, when we bring forth a full testimony to its immortal, ever-vigorous and creative spirit. Let us be inspired and guided by this; let us make it manifest to the whole world, that without diminishing or dimming its light, we can carry its torch high and illumine not only the path of our God-given destiny, but also the great destiny of this beloved country of ours.

Before concluding these humble remarks, I would like to ask you, dear Dr. McCann and dear Attorney General Rogers, to accept and convey my warmest expression of gratitude to our beloved Persident. Although I certainly hope to be able to pay him a personal visit, I ask you nevertheless to assure him of the love and esteem in which his All Holiness holds him, and of our prayers, which we unceasingly offer to God for him. You may, furthermore, assure our President that the Greek Orthodox Church in the Western Hemisphere will continue to be, not only a preacher, but a real factor of benevolence and peace both at home and abroad, and that our banner of the Risen Lord shall continue to proclaim the same ideals which the Star Spangled Banner proudly proclaims and heralds to the world.

I especially wish to acknowledge the presence of my brethren in Christ, who represent other churches and church organizations present here tonight. I would like to take this opportunity to pledge to them my full cooperation in such activities which hold a promise of further forging the link of brotherly love. As representative of our Ecumenical Patriarchate, which has proven its ecumenical spirit throughout its history, I would like to assure them that I shall do everything in my power to join with them in all efforts made toward church unity.

May the blessing and the grace and the mercy of the Lord enrich and protect and guide all men of good faith from glory to glory and from happiness to happiness.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE WEEK

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the week of April 12–18 has been proclaimed by Governor Nelson A. Rockefeller as Chamber of Commerce Week in New York State. I am pleased to take this opportunity to salute the chambers in my State, and all across the Nation, for their significant contributions to the building of a better America.

The New York Chamber of Commerce was chartered in 1768, and the charter was renewed at the first session of the New York Legislature. In the years since then, the chamber has worked unceasingly and courageously for its aims and objectives.

The chamber of commerce has consistently and ably presented the business point of view on matters of public and governmental impact. We in Government have benefited from their counsel and strong presentations.

The chamber movement has been closely linked with the economic growth of my State and our Nation. Through its unswerving and traditional beliefs in the free enterprise system, the chamber has encouraged the individual initiative and helped develop the leadership which is essential for the proper functioning of the American system.

The chamber of commerce has been in the vanguard of every major civic, educational, cultural, and philanthropic advance in recent history. Through its efforts, our cities are better places in which to work and live. It is important to note these significant contributions of the chamber movement, for all too often its leadership in community activities is overlooked.

I am proud to salute the chambers of commerce for their many contributions to the building of a better and more prosperous America. Through their efforts, the American ideals of individual initiative and free enterprise have been strengthened and promoted. I wish the chambers of New York State, and of all States, every success as they continue their important endeavors.

UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEMS

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, the Senate has passed a bill establishing a so-called Commission To Study Unemployment Problems.

It is unfortunate the Senate did not act with the same speed and righteous determination 3 weeks ago, when it had before it specific legislation that would really do something to meet the problems of unemployment.

I refer to the amendments we proposed which would have given some substance to the emergency unemployment compensation legislation.

However, I suppose it is much easier to set up a study commission than it is to tackle realistically the problems that unemployment creates—and the problems that create unemployment.

A study commission is a time-honored device which can accomplish two goals. For those who really want to know, it may provide the necessary information which can lead to action. For others, however, it may be a convenient out; an opportunity to give lipservice to a situation without having to do anything about it.

It strikes me as a bit odd that the U.S. Congress, with its vast sources of information, its active and supposedly knowledgeable committees, should have to resort to an outside commission to do its job for it.

Further, despite assurances to the contrary, I cannot help but feel that a major result of this commission plan will be to delay congressional action on proposed legislation already before it.

Certainly the Commission would be hard put to add to the case which already has been made for passage of the area redevelopment bill and the housing and airport legislation, for example.

Will the Commission come back and tell us that about 4½ million persons are unemployed, and that thousands upon thousands are exhausting—or have exhausted long ago—their unemployment benefits?

We need no commission to tell us that. We know that today, and we knew it 3 weeks ago when we had an opportunity in the Senate to do something about it.

The Commission on Unemployment Problems, once it is formed, will have 60 days to accentuate the obvious. I wish it well. If it leads to the reemployment of a single person, it will have served a purpose.

But the Congress of the United States could help a great many more persons—and do it much sooner—if it would live up to its responsibilities.

Mr. President, there is ample proposed legislation now before the Senate to meet both the current emergency and to help prevent such situations from occurring in the future. Many Senators have presented their suggested programs.

I have introduced or sponsored a number of bills which I believe would help carry out the intent of the Employment Act of 1946 as well as improve our national economy and standards. I ask unanimous consent that a list of these bills be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNEMPLOYMENT

S. 791: To establish uniform Federal standards of unemployment insurance of 39 weeks duration at 50 percent of average weekly wage.

S. 1323: McNamara bill to provide up to 16 weeks of emergency unemployment insurance to those who have exhausted other benefits or who were not in covered employment.

EMPLOYMENT

S. 1: Federal assistance to the States to build airports.

S. 8: McNamara bill to provide $2 billion in Federal funds over a 2-year period to assist the States in school construction.

S. 295: McNamara bill establishing a program to encourage operations of marginal copper mines necessary to the national defense.

S. 296: McNamara bill establishing a program to encourage continuing operation of iron mines in the interests of national defense.

S. 462: McNamara bill to provide for a 35-hour workweek under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

S. 722: Area redevelopment bill to provide Federal aid to areas crippled by chronic unemployment.

S. 1046: A bill to raise the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour to extend protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act to millions of workers in retail and other fields.

S. 1085: McNamara bill to provide farm workers with the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

EFFORTS OF THE ADMINISTRATION TO COMBAT UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, last week thousands of people from areas of unemployment in the East descended on Washington in an attempt to prove that the administration is not doing enough to create jobs. Several interesting and intelligent commentaries have been written relative to that incident and some of the attendant happenings. The first that has come to my attention was written by a man who has long been a friend of labor, and who is one of the country's better known labor writers, Mr. Jack Crellin of the Detroit Times. It is interesting to observe that this writer commented on the efforts of George Meany to suppress remarks from the floor and to subject the people in attendance to a rigid program of speeches. This constant denial of the democratic processes by the leaders of labor is one of the subjects of discussion in the coming debate on labor reform, and because this incident occurred just last week, and because it has been brought to the public's attention by Mr. Crellin, I ask unanimous consent that this particular column be inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE JOBLESS CONFERENCE THAT WAS A FIASCO

(By Jack Crellin)

Having suffered through our own private purgatory of 30 hours on a day coach, we feel we are entitled to at least a few observations about last week's fiasco mislabeled a conference of the unemployed in Washington.

For our money, it amounted to nothing more than exploitation of human misery by certain AFL–CIO leaders who should have known better.

If we appear prejudiced in this matter it is simply because we are.

Our sympathies go out to the thousands of bewildered delegates who were loaded aboard special railroad coaches and buses, hauled to Washington, and then herded like so many cattle into a steamy meeting hall on the city's outskirts where they were held virtual hostages for 6 hours of speeches by labor and political demagogs.

Sponsors of the rally, of course, will claim they accomplished their purpose of focusing national attention on the jobless situation and by wringing from a previously reluctant LYNDON JOHNSON, Senate Democratic majority leader, a vague promise of an investigation within 90 days.

But the thought occurs that if it took all that time and money to get the man who ostensibly speaks for the political party the AFL–CIO so enthusiastically supports at the polls to change his mind, that perhaps the AFL–CIO is getting a mighty poor return on its investment.

At least Jimmy Hoffa gets 6 percent on his.

Perhaps the most disappointing aspects of the meeting were the manner in which it was conducted and the general attitude of the brass toward the people in attendance.

If any of the delegates consented to the grueling trip in the belief they would be able to voice their opinions from the floor, they speedily learned they had been lured there under false pretenses.

They were regarded as little more than prize specimens put on display at a county fair. Their role was a silent one. They were to be seen but not heard.

The same holds true for those who planned to discuss their problems with their Congressmen.

The meeting site was so remote from Capitol Hill it is doubtful a majority of Congress was even aware of the visitors' presence.

AFL–CIO President George Meany seemed obsessed with the idea the meeting might get out of hand.

This apprehension on the part of Meany and others was apparent from the outset.

Staff members were posted at the doors to see that no one was admitted without the proper credentials.

The list of speakers was carefully arranged and screened in advance and to make doubly sure the delegates would not get into mischief. Box lunches consisting of a combination sandwich, a hard-boiled egg, an apple and a cupcake, were served right in the hall during the brief noon recess.

Meany ran the show with an iron hand.

He refused to tolerate questions from the floor.

His timetable called for speeches right up until the hour of adjournment.

The delegates, particularly the 1,400 from Michigan, endured the oratorical bombast for as long as they could.

When their patience was exhausted, they straggled out of the hall to soak up some of the warm spring sunshine.

When the final curtain came down less than one-third were still in their seats.

They all agreed some of the speeches were fine. But many a delegate wondered aloud why he had come to Washington to hear something he already knew—that it is mighty rough when you can't find a job.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Continuing in this same vein, it is about time that certain leaders of labor awaken to the fact that their very insistence on more Government intervention will mean the ultimate loss of more jobs. Last week I addressed myself on the Senate floor to the fact that Federal spending defeats its own end, and I once again remind the labor leaders and my colleagues that in spite of over 50 percent of the Federal budget being spent for props and crutches under the economy between 1932 and 1939, at no time was the unemployment mark below 7.7 million. Today, more people are at work than at any time in the history of this country, and while no one can stand idly by when unemployment exists, still it must be recognized that unemployment is at a low figure and employment at a high figure. Labor leaders now faced with the responsibility of holding the line in steel and other wages should realize that it is unearned wage increases, increases given without increase in productivity, that has created the base for price increases, which are also unearned. The labor leaders are willing to charge everybody but themselves with the responsibility of unemployment in this country, and it is time that they face up honestly to the fact that their own actions and insistence on more Federal participation has created unemployment, and is creating unemployment. In relation to this, I ask unanimous consent that an interesting article by David Lawrence, entitled "Job Destruction," be inserted at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From U.S. News & World Report, Apr. 20, 1959]

JOB DESTRUCTION

(By David Lawrence)

Several thousand unemployed workers assembled in an artificially contrived demonstration in Washington last week to attempt to prove that the administration isn't doing enough to create jobs.

The prescription offered—that the Government spend more money on various projects reminiscent of the "boondoggling" of the 1930's—was quickly embraced by some Democratic leaders. Indeed, it was suggested that a commission be appointed to investigate the plight of the unemployed in various areas. There were unmistakable signs of an effort to engage in political exploitation.

Memories are short. All the "made-work" appropriations in the period of the Hoover-Roosevelt depression from 1933 to 1940 did not at any time reduce the unemployment figure below the 7,700,000 mark. It still stood at 9,480,000 in 1939. Only defense projects necessitated by World War II ended use of the opiates that had proved so illusory in the attempt to increase employment. No effective substitute had been found for the normal processes of job creation, especially in the capital-goods industries which had been particularly neglected in the so-called depression remedies.

So it is today. Those economists with a nostalgia for the old New Deal pattern still urge the appropriation of billions of dollars of public funds for a variety of special projects aimed at stimulating the creation of jobs. They talk glibly of the expanding population and the "growth" that's ahead of us. But they do not put their finger on the poison that is stunting our growth today—the job destruction that has been consistently, though unwittingly, carried on by the organized-labor monopoly.

Certainly there is need for a commission to investigate, as Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, Democrat majority leader in the Senate—has proposed, but it should do more than seek headlines to emphasize for political reasons the fact that there is unemployment. What the commission should do, of course, is to investigate and expose the persistent destruction of jobs in the last several years.

It will be found that labor unions have forced prices up to the point where the products of many companies have been priced out of the market as bigger competitors, with better tools and equipment, have taken over.

It will be found that union labor has all too often abandoned at the collective-bargaining table the statesmanship of only 10 years ago when the AFL sent out a guidance memorandum to its local labor unions recommending that they take into account the financial and price problems of the employer before submitting requests for wage changes.

It will be found that the number of mergers, particularly among small businesses, has been large and that failures have increased because of exorbitant demands by labor unions which in many an industry make the small business pay the same wage rates as the big business.

It will be found that, whereas in 1956 American businessmen had approved plans for capital goods expansion—the building of new plants and the purchase of new tools and equipment—many of these projects had to be laid aside in the next 2 years because the cost of borrowing money had substantially increased and there was an inadequate supply of capital.

It will be found that plans on the drawing board today for normal expansion of American business would create more jobs than all the billions of public money which Congress is being urged to spend outside the budget.

It will be found that, whereas 850,000 youngsters come into the labor market each year, the big labor monopoly shuts many of them out as it continues the process of job destruction through the forcing of higher and higher prices beyond the consumer's capacity to pay.

It will be found that the drive for more and more Government spending for special interests has unbalanced our budget and produced around the world a loss of confidence in the American dollar.

It will be found that there are vast opportunities for American trade abroad even under existing tariffs and quotas but that the American workingman is not getting the benefit of such expansion because the American price level is inflated.

For the fact is that the labor monopoly and inflation have stunted job creation.

A commission appointed to "play politics with human misery" is indefensible. But a commission that will open the eyes of the American people to those forces and influences which have been carrying on for several years now a steady campaign of job destruction would be helpful. Such a fact-finding inquiry should, of course, be conducted by a body of broad-visioned citizens who are without political motivation and clearly without ties to the pressure groups.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Of course, the fiery Socialist leader, Walter Reuther, was in on this demonstration; in fact, the idea was his, so it was to be expected that he would be here and have his usual remarks to make, remarks not bearing on the subject. Every serious gathering must have its light side, and Mr. Reuther provided it in this instance. He made fun of our President for playing golf and for occasionally going quail hunting. I suggest that if Mr. Reuther had to work half the number of hours Mr. Eisenhower and other politicians put in during a routine day, he would be demanding double time, then triple time and then would probably quit in favor of unemployment relief. It is amusing to find Mr. Reuther commenting on Mr. Eisenhower's activities when Mr. Reuther himself had just returned from a rather extended sojourn in Puerto Rico where Life and other national magazines depicted the gathering sprawled around swimming pools, walking on the beaches and, in short, enjoying themselves as people on vacations do. I am not against labor leaders enjoying this kind of life, but I think it is in ill grace for one of the Nation's most prominent labor men to accuse the Chief Executive of idleness when he himself enjoys the same general relief from work from time to time. The President is accustomed to accomplishing work while he is on vacation. It is interesting to note that the vacationing labor leaders could not find time to apply their code of ethics to Mr. Maurice Hutcheson, president of the Carpenters' Union, for the disclosures made by the McClellan committee against them during the past year.

The Phoenix Gazette has suggested that Ike needs his own picket line, and so that my colleagues may know how a prominent Democrat editor of the West looks on the ridiculous outbursts of Mr. Reuther, I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Phoenix (Ariz.) Gazette, Apr. 11, 1959]

IKE NEEDS HIS OWN PICKET LINE

Walter Reuther has had his day at the lion pits. On the pretext of protesting against unemployment, the Socialist-minded labor tycoon gathered a mob of stooges in Washington to hoot at President Eisenhower for playing golf and make snide remarks about the Chief Executive for going quail hunting occasionally. It was all planned, we suspect, to give the common man a picture of Mr. Eisenhower eating cake while comrade citizen starves. Shades of the tumbrel and guillotine.

If most of the men in Reuther's mob had to work half the number of hours Mr. Eisenhower puts in as a matter of routine, they would quit in favor of unemployment relief and idleness. If all of them were denied access to normal recreation, as the President always is, they would be crying for the head of every labor union leader in sight. How far can we go with stupidity encouraged by a politically ambitious leftwinger?

When he is in Washington, Mr. Eisenhower goes to work on the early shift and quits on the late one. He is at his desk when most of us are still resting comfortably in the sheets. He is never free from official duties and his mind can never relax from the problems of his job. He is subject to call at any hour of the night, and there is no bonus guaranteed every time the office rings up his bedroom. Who wants a job like that?

Then there are the vacations. Mr. Eisenhower takes quite a few of them. With pay, too. We all joke about them. But Reuther and his boys aren't joking; they're downright serious. And what they somehow never got around to reminding themselves is that Mr. Eisenhower doesn't take the same kind of vacations most of us do. An office staff goes along, and there are teletypes and telephones, and constant problems to be reviewed. Five hours is about the least working time the President puts in during a normal vacation day, and it often runs as high as 10. Who wants a vacation like that?

Reuther's "march on Washington" showed the Detroiter's hand as few things have. We are sorry George Meany was pressured into taking part—against his better judgment, by all accounts. The demonstration turned into nothing but a political maneuver of the lowest sort, an obvious attempt to arouse class prejudice and hatred against the administration through moronic hysteria.

It's too bad Mr. Eisenhower can't throw a picket line around Reuther.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959—MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the minority views, prepared by the staffs of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and myself, in connection with the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, Senate bill 1555, be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the minority views were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINORITY VIEWS

We oppose the passage of this bill in its present form because it fails to achieve the objectives which the American public demands.

In January 1957, as a result of the hue and cry raised across the country for an investigation into the corruption and racketeering in the labor-management field, the Senate unanimously authorized creation of a select committee, popularly known as the McClellan rackets committee. That committee held extensive hearings during 1957 and issued an interim report in March 1958 which constituted a shocking indictment of the practices followed or allowed in a number of labor unions and by some employers. Continued hearings in 1958, and this year as well, accumulated evidence of the extent of the racketeering and corruption which exists in important segments of the labor movement. Moreover, these more recent hearings also revealed how certain traditional devices of labor unions, such as the picket line and the boycott, had been corrupted to further the nefarious ends of dishonest and racketeering labor bosses. It is painfully clear that what is needed, and what the public is insistently demanding, is Federal legislation designed both to assure some minimum measure of internal union democracy and an effective curb on the corruption and racketeering which the McClellan committee had revealed.

MINIMUM STANDARDS OF UNION DEMOCRACY

In March 1958, the American Civil Liberties Union pointed out the need for a labor union bill of rights which would guarantee the following as a minimum program of union democracy:

(1) Freedom of speech, press, and assembly for all union members.

(2) Freedom of elections and secret balloting for all union members.

(3) Regulation of and limitation on the imposition of trusteeships over local unions by the internationals and certain guarantees for local union automony.

(4) Comprehensive and detailed accounting of union funds, and disclosure of the same to union members.

(5) Equal treatment by the union of all its members.

(6) Due process within the union guaranteeing all members the right to be protected through fair and impartial hearings and before unbiased and independent tribunals with respect to disciplinary proceedings against them.

The committee bill does nothing at all to achieve points (1), (5), and (6). Those portions of the bill dealing with points (2), (3), and (4) are inadequate in important respect to achieve these basic, minimum objectives. There is a complete failure either to impose certain necessary legal obligations and limitations on union officers or to provide those sanctions which are essential to make these provisions of the bill effective.

However, what is most shocking about the committee bill is its spurious appearance of granting union members rights and protections which they now lack but which on close examination are revealed as either feeble or nonexistent. The bill is full of "gimmicks" intended to lull the public into believing it lives up to its advance billing as a genuine labor reform measure. In committee, the minority made every effort to write an effective bill more in line with what the public is demanding, but through sheer weight of numbers, the proponents of the bill, except for a few amendments which it would have been impossible for anyone to reject, blocked us at every turn. An analysis of these "gimmicks" together with those of our amendments which the majority perforce accepted, appear as appendix A and B to these minority views.

THE M'CLELLAN COMMITTEE FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The committee bill fails in substantial respects to carry out the recommendations of the McClellan rackets committee or to impose those measures which are necessary to implement its findings. That committee made these specific recommendations and findings in the following areas:

I. Filing, reporting and disclosure of union financial affairs

The McClellan committee declared that financial statements required to be filed by labor unions be further required "to be accurate and complete, that there be a method for checking of their veracity and provisions for bringing legal action against unions filing false statements and against the officers of the unions testifying to these false statements." The "gimmicks" in the bill's provisions dealing with this recommendation are exposed in appendix B to this minority report. The most important weakness, however, of the reporting and disclosure provisions of the committee bill is the lack of an adequate procedure for compelling labor unions to rid themselves of the criminals, crooks, thieves, betrayers, and misleaders of their membership.

The committee bill relies exclusively on criminal proceedings and penalties against unions and union officers who fail to comply with its requirements. Thus, the membership is relieved of any substantial responsibility for cleaning its own house. We fully agree with the following statement made by Senator MORSE during the course of the hearings before our subcommittee:

"And I just want to say to the union leaders of America this morning that if their point of view is that no legislation should be passed that holds the membership responsible in any way for the misconduct of the union officials, they have lost me on that issue."

A maximum fine of $10,000 against a labor union, particularly if it is a fairly large one, is scarcely sufficient to induce the membership to get rid of its lawbreaking officials.

A much more effective means for inducing necessary action by the membership is to deprive the noncomplying union, during the period of noncompliance, of some of the special privileges which have been granted to unions by Federal statute. Two of these are immunity from Federal income taxation and the right to use the processes of Federal labor agencies such as the National Labor Relations Board and the National Mediation Board. We would deny these two privileges to any union that failed to comply with the provisions of the committee bill or which failed to rid itself of corrupt, racketeering, or criminal officials. Both the McClellan bill, S. 1137, and the bill, S. 748, take this approach, and it is our intention to offer amendments along these lines on the floor of the Senate.

II. Fiduciary obligations of union officials

The McClellan committee declared:

"Since union moneys * * * are in actuality a trust, being held for the members of the union by their officers, the committee feels that attention should be given to placing certain restrictions on the use of these funds, such as now are imposed on banks and other institutions which act as repositories and administrators for trust funds."

The committee bill professes to recognize the fiduciary nature of the union official's relation to his union and its members, but makes no provision to establish such relationship, to impose the duties of a fiduciary on union officials, or to give union members any remedy for a breach of the fiduciary obligation.

In virtually every State in the Nation, the officers and directors of corporations are made fiduciaries by statute and held to the strictest accountability in their handling of corporate funds and property. Moreover, any profit or gain which accrues to them by virtue of their official position, even if no damage to the corporation or stockholder results, is held in constructive trust for the benefit of the corporation and its stockholders. Under these statutes, stockholders are given the right to enforce the fiduciary obligation through a suit in the courts. The same obligations and remedies attach to the officers and directors of nonprofit and eleemosynary corporations—churches, hospitals, charitable institutions, etc. Union officials alone seem to be free from what has become a normal, in fact a universal, obligation of officials similarly situated.

Only one State has enacted a statute imposing fiduciary obligations on union officials and giving union members a right to sue in the event of any breach thereof. New York, within recent weeks has done so, despite the objection by the New York State AFL–CIO that this type of reform legislation should be left to the Federal Government, a position directly contrary to that taken by the supporters of the committee bill in connection with the question of fiduciary status. The case law in the States on this subject, is almost nonexistent, and the omission of any enforceable fiduciary provision from the committee bill constitutes a failure to provide what could be the most effective possible device for enabling rank-and-file union members themselves to control financial misconduct on the part of their officials.

Both the McClellan bill (S. 1137) and S. 748 contain provisions designed to impose fiduciary obligations on union officials and to give union members a right to sue in the Federal courts for breach thereof. It is our intention to offer on the floor of the Senate, amendments designed to fill this unjustifiable vacuum.

III. Union election procedures

The McClellan committee recommended legislation directed "to the use of secret ballots in union elections and other vital union decisions."

As pointed out in appendix B, the "gimmicks" in title III of the committee bill which deals with the election and removal of union officers are enough to nullify much of the effectiveness of these provisions. Similarly, title II of the committee bill which regulates the imposition of trusteeships over local unions by national and international labor organizations, is crippled by hedging the remedies it provides with conditions which substantially diminish their effectiveness. These shortcomings also are described in appendix B.

IV. The "no man's land" problem

One of the most important problems which faced the committee was that raised by the existence of the "no man's land" in labor relations resulting from recent decisions of the Supreme Court. Small employers, their employees, and the unions which deal or seek to deal with them are denied access to both the National Labor Relations Board and to any State court or agency for the resolution of their labor-relations problems or for relief from illegal practices and conduct. In consequence the "no man's land" has become a happy hunting ground for corrupt and racketeering unions and their officials. Small employers and their employees in this area which exists "outside the law" are increasingly being victimized and are helpless to protect themselves. So shocking had this situation become that the McClellan committee, in order to insure these victims an effective and quick-acting forum recommended legislation authorizing any State or Territory "to assume and assert jurisdiction over labor disputes over which the [National Labor Relations Board] declines jurisdiction."

Both S. 748 and a separate bill, S. 1386, introduced by Senator MCCLELLAN, seek to remedy this situation by provisions designed to carry out the rackets committee's recommendation and we intend to offer such amendments on the floor of the Senate. The provision in the committee bill takes exactly the contrary approach of compelling the National Labor Relations Board to assert its full jurisdiction by taking every case. However, instead of doing this in a straightforward and unequivocal fashion (as was done in the original Kennedy-Ervin bill, S. 505), the committee bill disguises what it does by permitting the Federal Board to cede some of its jurisdiction to the States but in such a manner and under such conditions as to transform the State agency to which cession is made into a mere subordinate arm of the National Labor Relations Board for the administration, not of its own State law, but of the Federal law.

It is impossible to believe that any State would accept cession under these circumstances and, in any event, even if the States were willing, it would require years for all 50 of them to enact the necessary legislation. The net result is that the Federal Board would be compelled to take every case, and its present timelag of about 2 years in disposing of cases might grow to 3 or even 4 years or more. Relief provided to the victims after such a waiting period can scarcely be regarded as an adequate solution of the "no man's land" problem. Most of the victims will have lost their businesses or their jobs while their cases are pending before the Federal Board.

V. Organizational and recognition picketing

The McClellan committee found that "the weapon of organizational picketing had been abused" by its use without regard to the desires of the employees in question.

The Taft-Hartley Act guarantees to employees the right to form or join labor unions, and, in complete freedom, to select unions to represent them for the purposes of collective bargaining. It also guarantees employees the right to refrain from engaging in these activities or from exercising these rights and protects them against restraint or coercion by either an employer or a labor union in the enjoyment of these guarantees. Neither the committee bill, nor any other proposal before the Congress, is designed to destroy or weaken these rights. To the contrary, all of the proposed legislation purports to strengthen and help enforce these rights.

Nevertheless, the committee bill by completely ignoring recognition and organizational picketing by labor unions which do not represent a majority of the employees in the picketed enterprise, fails to provide the very protection of these employee rights which the Taft-Hartley Act prescribes. By doing nothing to limit such picketing, the committee bill, in effect, permits employees to be restrained or coerced in their right to join or not to join a union, to select or refuse to accept a union as their collective-bargaining representative, as well as permitting an employer to be coerced into violating the law by forcing him to recognize a union which the majority of his employees do not wish either to join or to select as their bargaining representative, thus depriving them of the rights guaranteed to them by law.

This type of picketing is a favorite device of the corrupt Teamsters Union. Godfrey P. Schmidt, professor of law at Fordham University, the man who initiated the action against the Teamsters which resulted in the Federal court's establishing a monitorship over that union (Professor Schmidt is one of the three monitors), and who probably knows as much about labor union corruption and racketeering as anyone in the country, had this to say about such picketing in his testimony before our subcommittee:

"From my conversations with rank and file workers, I am persuaded that they are as convinced as I am that no labor reform can be effectuated unless recognitional and organizational picketing is banned. Your prohibition of blackmail picketing is completely inadequate. In the first place, it neglects the rather obvious fact that your proposed section 8(b)7 (p. 48 of your bill) could very easily be evaded. In the second place, your language makes enforcement all but impossible. I see no reason why the coercive thrust of the picket line should be permitted to be used to prevent free choice of bargaining agents, which is supposed to be central to the labor relations policy of this country. When you questioned me on this point you were concerned with the plight of Puerto Rican workers who were being exploited by employers by means of low wages and bad working conditions. So am I. But such situations are far more rare, in my opinion, than the situation with which I am concerned, namely, the repeated instances of backdoor agreements between corrupt or dictatorial labor leaders and employers, both of whom turn their backs on employees' wishes. Moreover, the case of the exploited worker can easily be handled by the traditional organizational methods which have made unionism great for many years past."

Both S. 748 and S. 1387, the bill introduced by Senator McCLELLAN, deal adequately and effectively with the problem. The committee bill ignores it but tries to divert attention from this omission by making it unlawful for a union to picket the premises of an employer for the purpose of taking or obtaining from the employer "against his will or with his consent * * * any money or other thing of value * * * for the personal profit of any individual." A discussion of this diversionary provision is contained in appendix B.

Section 504 of bill S. 748 amends the Taft-Hartley Act by making it an unfair labor practice for a union, by picketing, to coerce an employer to recognize it as the bargaining representative of his employees, or to coerce his employees to accept or designate it as their representative, where "the employer has recognized in accordance with the Taft-Hartley Act any labor organization and a question concerning representation may not properly be raised; within the last preceding 12 months a valid election has been conducted; the union cannot establish the existence of a sufficient interest on the part of the employees in having it represent them; picketing has been engaged in for a reasonable period of time and an election has not been conducted."

A mandatory injunction for violation of this provision is also provided in bill S. 748.

Senate bills S. 748 and S. 1387 deal with what is commonly known as recognition picketing. They cover the type of situation where the union attempts to secure recognition and bargaining rights by the pressure brought on the employees or employer by a picket line. This is also sometimes known as organization from the top as distinguished from the accepted organizational technique of attempting to persuade the employees to join by use of handbills, letters, meetings, personal solicitation, etc.

The committee bill deals with a situation—extortion picketing—which although indefensible is practically unknown in the United States. In the situation which the bill seeks to cover the picketing union leader or gangster does not want the employees of the picketed employer to join any union and may not have a charter or affiliation from any union which would permit him to admit the employees to membership if they evidenced an interest. In those rare cases the situation would be no different if the union leader or gangster leading the picketing had a gun rather than a picket sign to enforce his demands.

We have no objection to such conduct being prohibited, and there is no doubt that it is now unlawful in all the States and under existing Federal law as well, for it is simply extortion.

During the last year the National Labor Relations Board has held it to be an unfair labor prictice for a union to picket for recognition after having lost an election. The first case to so hold was the Curtis Brothers decision (41 L.R.R.M. 1025 (Oct. 30, 1957)). It appears significant that the Taft-Hartley law had been in effect for over 10 years at the time of this decision. During that 10-year span the Labor Board must have had doubts that the law made such conduct an unfair labor practice. Although many charges were filed with the General Counsel alleging such conduct to be an unfair labor practice those charges were not processed, the General Counsel apparently relying on a 1948 decision of the Labor Board in Perry Norvell (23 L.R.R.M. 1061). During that period the Labor Board was narrowly limiting the application of section 8(b)(1)(a) of the Taft-Hartley Act to violence or mass picketing.

The facts in the Curtis case were simple. The union involved lost an election among the company's employees by a vote of 28 to 1. The union continued to picket after the election, the picket signs reading substantially that Curtis Bros., employs nonunion drivers, Curtis Bros., unfair to Teamsters Union, Teamsters Union wants employees of Curtis Bros. to join them to gain union wages, hours, and working conditions. The Labor Board's decision holding such conduct to be an unfair labor practice came down after 2 years of such picketing, illustrating, incidentally, the present timelag under which the Labor Board is currently operating.

Following the Curtis decision the Labor Board has issued a number of like decisions. In no case was an injunction sought by the Board to stop picketing pending decision on the merits. The Curtis decision was appealed and on November 26, 1958, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia circuit, by a 2 to 1 decision, reversed the Board, holding that the conduct—peaceful picketing for recognition—is not banned by present law. The National Labor Relations Board is presently seeking certiorari in this case. A decision by the ninth circuit on similar facts, Alloy Mfg. (43 L.R.R.M. 2548), sheds no light on the question because the case was decided upon a technicality. Other cases are pending in the fourth and second circuits, having not as yet been argued. The present situation then is that the only court which has spoken upon the subject, has held it not be an unfair labor practice to picket for recognition even after the union has lost an election.

Situations like Curtis are not infrequent. Organizing from the top rather than persuasion of the employees has become the standard organizing procedure of many unions—in particular the racket-ridden Teamsters Union. The union seeks to bring economic pressure directly upon the employees to force them to join the union in order to protect their jobs. Obviously, if Curtis' customers (Curtis is a retail furniture dealer) stopped doing business with Curtis so long as the picketing took place, there would be no jobs for the employees. The same result would follow if the picketing caused Curtis' suppliers to stop making deliveries to it. In either case, at the very least, hours of work and earnings of employees would be reduced. The direct economic pressure by the union upon the employees is thus clear.

Such picketing also has the purpose of coercing the employer into recognizing the union and signing a contract with it, thus forcing the employees to join, even though the employees have shown that they do not want the union as their bargaining agent. The employer is thus coerced by the threat to his business to violate the law by coercing his employees into joining the union. It would be difficult to imagine a tactic more alien to the free choice with respect to unionization that the Taft-Hartley Act guaranteed to employees. One of the basic purposes of the act is to promote industrial stability and peace. To this end section 9(c)(3), for example, prohibits more than one election per year and was included in the Taft-Hartley Act to give both employees and employers a period of peace free from the unsettling effects of a union organizing campaign. Another section of the act requires the employer to bargain with a union which the Board has certified after the union has won an election. But where the union loses an election the Board certifies that fact and the employer is not only free to refuse to deal with it, but in fact violates the law if he treats it as the majority representative of his employees. Picketing following the loss of an election thus thwarts the purposes of the act and should be made illegal.

Opponents of any restrictions upon recognition picketing attempt to conjure up situations where a strict ban on recognition picketing could conceivably work a hardship on the picketing union. The same technique of suggesting a parade of imaginary horribles was used in 1947 in opposition to almost every proposal to amend the Wagner Act by Taft-Hartley. Those dire predictions simply did not come to pass.

Section 504 of the bill, S. 748, attempts to prevent any possible miscarriage of justice by giving the Labor Board a great deal of latitude in determining when it will act to stop the picketing. Thus, it may act when picketing has been engaged in for a "reasonable period of time" or when the union cannot establish the existence of a "sufficient interest." Opponents of any legislation on the subject ask what is a "reasonable period of time" and what is a "sufficient interest"? But the Board has had over 20 years of experience in determining similar questions in various situations which arise in representation cases, such as the percentage needed to obtain an election and the percentage needed to intervene in a representation case. We doubt that the Board would have any trouble laying out the ground rules for "reasonable period of time" or "sufficient interest" taking into account all the circumstances in a given case.

Opponents of any legislation controlling recognition picketing state that it needs more study. They ignore the fact that committees of one House of Congress or the other have been studying it since 1947. Opponents cite examples like the following: A union obtains a membership-card majority and files a petition for an election; the employer then discharges several union adherents; the union waives the charges it has made of discriminatory discharge so that the election may proceed; and then the union loses the election. Opponents, using these facts, say that S. 748 would prevent use of a picket line. This is simply not so.

The union could picket to force the employer to remedy the unfair labor practice by reinstating and providing back pay to the dischargees. Under S. 748 the Board would have discretion to extend the scope of "reasonable * * * time" and "sufficient interest." The argument also ignores a long line of Board decisions holding that upon a finding of facts similar to those above presented, the Board will order the employer to bargain with the union using the card majority as proof of majority without an election. (See Drummond Implement Co., 102 NLRB No. 62; W. T. Grant Co., 94 NLRB No. 145 enforced 199 F. (2d) 711 (C.A. 9); M. H. Davidson Co., 94 NLRB 142; Armco Drainage, 32 L.R.R.M. 1538, enforced 220 F. (2d) 573 (C.A. 6), certiorari denied, 350 U.S. 838.) In any event, for every imaginary situation which opponents may suggest, there are innumerable actual cases where employees have been forced into unions against their will by the recognition picket line.

VI. Secondary boycotts

During the fall of 1958, the McClellan committee devoted considerable time and a number of hearings to the problems raised by the indiscriminate use of secondary boycotts, many types of which are not held to be unfair labor practices under the Taft-Hartley Act's ban on secondary boycotts.

The records of the National Labor Relations Board show that from the enactment of Taft-Hartley in 1947 until the present, 34 percent of the secondary boycott cases coming to the Board involve the Teamsters Union which represents about 10 percent of all of the members of organized labor. Thus, the figures demonstrate, that like minority picketing, the secondary boycott is a favorite device of the Teamsters, and is used by them at least three and one-half times as frequently as it is by any of the rest of the labor movement.

The basic justification for banning secondary boycotts is to protect genuinely neutral employers and their employees, not themselves involved in a labor dispute, against economic coercion designed to give a labor union victory in a dispute with some other employer. Congress thought it had achieved this objective when, in adopting the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947, it enacted section 8(b)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act. Unfortunately, decisions of the National Labor Relations Board and the courts have so interpreted section 8(b)(4) as to leave a number of gaping loopholes through which genuinely neutral employers and their employees continue to be victimized by the use of the secondary boycott.

Professor Schmidt, in his testimony, characterized the secondary boycott in the following terms:

"Since the irresponsible power of labor leaders needs curbing (it is this power which gives them the opportunity to play dictator), secondary boycotts, which is a source of this power, must be limited. (The original intention of those who framed the Taft-Hartley law has been betrayed or frustrated by a whole series of Board and court decisions.) I think the administration bill's provisions in this respect should be incorporated in your bill. With growing impertinence, labor leaders dragoon neutrals into participation in their labor disputes. We need the rational limitation which the administration bill provides. I am not impressed by the argument that corrupt practices should be remedied by one bill and labor relations by another bill. What you must strike at is the source of untrammeled power exercised by labor leaders. You must submit that power to reasonable and civilized regulation. Most of the corrupt practices revealed by the McClellan committee have been made possible, against the wishes of the decent rank-and-file majority, precisely because union leaders have held at the head of the worker several cocked guns: (a) compulsory unionism without any effective intraunion bill of rights; (b) organizational and recognitional picketing; and (c) the secondary boycott bloated to the unconscionable grab for power now permitted by the Board and the courts."

The major loopholes in the present ban on secondary boycotts are:

(1) Coercion of employers. Present law makes it an unfair labor practice for a union or its agents to urge the employees of an employer to refuse to perform work for the purpose of compelling their employer to cease doing business with some other person. This provides the biggest loophole in present law. The prohibition is against the threatening or urging of the employees of the other employer. Nothing is said about urging or persuading the employer of the secondary employees. Thus a union having a dispute with or attempting to organize the employees of employer A can go directly to employer B, who either uses employer A's products or supplies employer A with raw materials, and threaten employer B with a strike or picket line if he continues to do business with employer A. If the union happens to be bargaining agent for the employees of B, it takes little persuasion of B to get him to stop doing business with A. B does not want trouble with the union with which he has a contract and anyway A is only one of his many suppliers or customers. So B readily succumbs to the union pressure and tells A he no longer wishes A's products or will no longer supply raw materials to A, and in so doing no one has violated present law. But look at the situation of employer A. Perhaps B is his primary customer or supplier. His alternative is to yield entirely to the union's demands, force his employees to join the union, or go out of business. Countless examples of actual cases corresponding to this hypothetical have been presented to congressional committees in various hearings since 1947.

The bill, S. 748, meets this problem by amending section 8(b)(4) of the present law to make the restriction apply to "threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce * * *" as well as "induce or encourage any individual employed by any person."

(2) Hot-cargo clauses: It has become common to find clauses in union contracts whereby the employer agrees not to handle what the union chooses to call "hot goods," "unfair materials," and "blacklisted products." Such clauses have become standard in contracts entered into by the Teamsters Union. Here, employer A, who has a dispute with a union or whose employees are being solicited for union membership, is in real trouble. He may have customers waiting for his product or he may have suppliers eager to send him raw material, but both his delivery of products and supply of raw material cannot move from or to his place of business because the carriers in either instance have "hot cargo" clauses in their contracts with the Teamsters Union. His alternative is the same as in loophole No. 1—go out of business or yield to the union's demand, which often is a demand for a compulsory membership contract with a union which his employees do not want.

These "hot cargo" contracts have been the subject of much litigation before the Board, the courts, and the Interstate Commerce Commission. A review of these cases leads to the conclusion that while there may be circumstances under which a "hot cargo" contract is not a defense to otherwise unlawful conduct, generally speaking it does provide a large loophole in the ban on secondary boycotts.

S. 748 makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to coerce an employer to enter into such an agreement, or having entered into it, for a union to coerce the employer to live up to it, or to induce his employees to take economic action to force the employer to live up to it. Only the latter is now unlawful under the Taft-Hartley Act.

(3) Boycotts by railroad employees, agricultural workers, Government employees, and other groups now excluded from the secondary boycott ban of the Taft-Hartley Act: Under the definition section of the Taft-Hartley Act railroad employees, agricultural workers, and governmental employees are not employees within the meaning of the act. The Board has reached the conclusion that secondary boycotts by these exempt categories, and the inducement of such boycotts are not unfair labor practices. (See International Rice Milling, 84 N.L.R.B. 360, and Di Giorgio Wine, 87 N.L.R.B. No. 125.)

Secondary boycotts by these groups are just as much against the public interest as boycotts by anyone else.

The bill, S. 748, would extend the ban to these excluded categories by use of the words "any person" instead of the use of the words "employees of any employer" in section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii).

(4) Inducement of an individual. The word "concerted" in section 8(b)(4) of the present act has opened another loophole. The Supreme Court held in N.L.R.B. v. International Rice Milling (341 U.S. 665) that it did not constitute a violation when pickets stopped a single truck. Thus, when trucks appear one at a time and are prevailed upon not to cross a picket line, there is no "inducement to concerted activity." S. 748 closes this loophole by dropping the word "concerted" from section 8(b)(4).

Senator McClellan has also introduced bills, S. 1384 and S. 1385, which deal effectively with these loopholes.

REPORTING REQUIREMENTS FOR EMPLOYERS AND THEIR REPRESENTATIVES

Section 8(c) of title I of the Taft-Hartley Act reads as follows:

"The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this act, if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit."

Senate Report No. 105, which accompanied the Taft-Hartley bill, stated:

"Another amendment to this section would insure both to employers and labor organizations full freedom to express their views to employees on labor matters, refrain from threats of violence, intimation of economic reprisal, or offers of benefit. The Supreme Court in Thomas v. Collins (323 U.S. 516) held, contrary to some earlier decisions of the Labor Board, that the Constitution guarantees freedom of speech on either side in labor controversies and approved the doctrine of the American Tube Bending case (134 F. (2d) 993). The Board has placed a limited construction upon these decisions by holding such speeches by employers to be coercive if the employer was found guilty of some other unfair labor practice, even though severable or unrelated (Monumental Life Insurance, 69 N.L.R.B. 247) or if the speech was made in the plant on working time (Clark Brothers, 70 N.L.R.B. 60). The committee believes these decisions to be too restrictive."

It is difficult to comprehend how anyone in 1959 could seriously contend that the American worker should be legally prevented from hearing all sides of a labor-management dispute. In 1935 when the Wagner Act was passed, it may have been true that in a number of situations any statements by employers might be considered to be undue influence. But, in the last two decades the labor movement has grown by leaps and bounds. It is difficult to imagine any American industrial worker being cowed or unduly influenced by any statements on the part of his employer which do not violate section 8(c). We believe that any worker would strongly resent the implication that he has to be protected from such statements or that he is not entitled to hear all sides of an organization question before casting his ballot.

Yet the committee bill would have the practical effect of depriving employees of hearing from their employer during an organizational campaign. The union seeking to organize them might have been shown by the McClellan committee to be ridden by racketeers, or to be Communist dominated; yet an employer would be deterred from bringing such facts to the employees attention if the committee bill were enacted. The employer might be paying substantially higher wages and granting many more fringe benefits than the employer down the street whose employees are represented by the same union, which is promising "pie in the sky" to his employees if they only vote for the union. But he would seriously doubt the wisdom of bringing these facts to the attention of his employees who are about to vote upon the question of whether that union should represent them. Section 103 of the committee bill has the practical effect of diminishing the protection afforded by the free-speech provision of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Section 103(a)(1) requires an employer to report any expenditure in connection with an agreement with a labor relations consultant or other independent contractor whereby the consultant undertakes activities where "an object thereof, directly or indirectly, is to persuade employees" to exercise or not to exercise their right to join a union. More sweeping language could hardly be found for effectively discouraging such a consultant from doing anything in an organizing campaign, unless the employer reported it to the Secretary of Labor. It should be noted that section 103(b) also requires the consultant to make such a report.

There would be no objection to requiring the reporting of any action on the part of a consultant which would constitute an unfair labor practice, althought the present section 8(a) of the Taft-Hartley law contains adequate safeguards and remedies against such abuses. This is the approach taken by the bill, S. 748, the McClellan bill, S. 1137, and by the statute recently enacted by the State of New York by an overwhelming majority of the representatives of both parties in the legislature of that State.

Furthermore, while the term "labor relations consultant" is not defined in the bill, since it covers any independent contractor, it obviously includes attorneys. Section 103(b) uses the term "person" and section 111 uses the words "any person who acts as a labor relations expert, adviser, or consultant" in making specified conduct of such people unlawful. Since in substantially every case, employees consult with and seek the help and guidance of attorneys, these requirements must be judged with respect to their effect upon the privileged nature of the attorney-client relationship and the attorney's obligation under the Canons of Ethics.

The American Bar Association considered this problem at its midwinter meeting just concluded, and a resolution was adopted by its house of delegates which reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the American Bar Association urges that in any proposed legislation in the labor-management field the traditional confidential relationship between attorney and client be preserved, and that no such legislation should require report or disclosure, by either attorney or client, of any matter which has traditionally been considered as confidential between a client and his attorney, including but not limited to the existence of the relationship of attorney and client, the financial details thereof, and any advice or activities of the attorney on behalf of his client which fall within the scope of the legitimate practice of law; and be it further

"Resolved, That the officers and councils of the sections of labor relations law and corporation, banking and business law be directed to bring the foregoing resolution to the attention of the Members and proper committees of Congress in connection with any proposed legislation in this field and to oppose legislation contrary to the principles urged in said resolution."

In committee, the minority offered amendments both to define the term "labor relations consultant" and to protect the traditionally privileged communications between attorney and client. Both of these amendments were rejected despite the fact that the recently enacted New York statute to which reference was made above defines "labor relations consultant" and protects the client-attorney relationship. It seems strange that the supporters of the committee bill should reject provisions which the government of a State as traditionally friendly to labor as New York adopts so overwhelmingly.

Section 103(a) (1) and (2) require reporting by an employer of any expenditure made directly by himself or to a consultant who "undertakes to supply such employer with information concerning the activities of employees or a labor organization in connection with a labor dispute, except information for use solely in conjunction with a judicial, administrative, or arbitral proceeding." This would seem to be contrary to the professed purpose of the committee bill which is to prevent wrongdoing and racketeering by exposing it to the white light of publicity. Evidence before the McClellan committee may reflect directly upon the motivation and background of the union and the organizers leading the organizational campaign. Yet a consultant, who provides such material and advises upon the means of communicating it to the employees, must report it and the employer must also report it. The attorney, who is acting as a consultant, is confronted with the alternative of reporting and thus violating the attorney-client relationship or failing to report, thereby subjecting himself to the criminal penalties provided by section 108(a).

We would have no objection to such provision if it were limited to what is commonly known as espionage, already illegal under section 8(a) of the Taft-Hartley law, but the minority's amendment to that effect was rejected in committee. However, it also covers many other types of information which the employees should know about the labor organization which is seeking to represent them if they are to cast an intelligent ballot.

The sole argument advanced to justify this type of reporting requirement for employers and their representatives is that under the committee bill labor unions are required to make far more extensive financial reports than are employers, and hence that it is not unfair to impose these requirements on the latter and their representatives.

Although this argument is literally true, it is also quite misleading. For it creates the erroneous impression that management is required to do little or no reporting to government of its financial affairs, activities, and condition. To the contrary, business enterprise under both State and Federal law, is subjected to a degree of financial reporting and public disclosure far more extensive and detailed than anything that is required of labor unions under the committee bill plus any other statute, State and Federal, now on the books. Appendix C sets forth a brief summary of such reporting requirements.

Moreover, this insistence upon parallelism or mutuality in labor legislation, a doctrine which asserts that every legal obligation or restriction imposed upon labor unions should also be imposed upon employers and vice versa, is utterly unsound and has been rejected even by those experts in labor relations who are most sympathetic to the cause of organized labor. Congress not only has the right, but the duty, to legislate against specific evils within its jurisdiction and should not be compelled mechanically to extend its legislation to areas where it would be inappropriate merely because of a false doctrine of parallelism. The financial affairs of labor and of management do not give rise to the same or even similar problems, and Congress would have no justification in refusing to deal with one set of these problems merely because its program for doing so was entirely inappropriate and unrelated to the other set. This entire issue is analyzed at length in appendix D.

For these reasons we believe that the approach taken by S. 748, S. 1137, and the recently enacted New York State law, should be substituted for these provisions of the committee bill: to wit, that employers and their representatives be required to report those financial expenditures only which are designed to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their statutory rights or to secure information about the activities engaged in by their employees in the proper and legitimate exercise of those rights.

REVISIONS OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

The revelations of the McClellan committee which have so aroused the American public have not been primarily concerned with labor-management relations, and are related only incidentally to the area covered by the Taft-Hartley Act. Hence, we agree with those who insist that the labor-reform legislation to cope with corruption, racketeering, and lack of internal union democracy which the public is demanding, is wholly different from and unrelated to revision of the Taft-Hartley Act for the purpose of improving the law governing labor-management relations and that the two are best dealt with entirely separately.

There are, however, a few amendments of the Taft-Hartley Act which are so directly related to the subject of labor reform and which are so inevitably intertwined with any adequate program for effective reform, that we do not hesitate to assert that absent such Taft-Hartley amendments, no adequate and effective legislative labor reform program is attainable. In our opinion, there are no more than four of such essential Taft-Hartley amendments and they have all been dealt with at considerable length in this minority report.

They are as follows:

First, elimination of the loopholes in the ban against secondary boycotts;

Second, some limitations on the right of minority unions to engage in organizational and recognition picketing;

Third, the elimination of the "no man's land" in labor disputes and the solution of the problems which the existence of the "no man's land" had given rise to; and

Last, the revision of section 302 of the Taft-Hartley Act to prevent certain abuses involving so-called middlemen and possible subversion of union officials as provided in the committee bill but as amended along the lines unsuccessfully proposed in committee by the minority.

We cannot think of any other provision of the Taft-Hartley Act or any relevant or legitimate amendment thereto which has or could have even the slightest significance for or be in the slightest degree necessary to the achievement of an effective labor reform program. For that reason we believe that all other proposed amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act such as are contained in both the committee and administrative bills are entirely irrelevant to the professed objective of labor-reform legislation.

Our conclusion in this respect is entirely consistent with the action taken by our committee in establishing a panel of 12 labor relations experts to make a study of needed revisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, and to report their findings and recommendations to our committee. It seems to us that for the Congress to act on any revision of Taft-Hartley which is unrelated to the subject of labor reform is to anticipate, yes, even to undercut the work of that panel of experts.

The sole justification advanced for the inconsistency of the committee bill in including irrelevant Taft-Hartley amendments, despite the creation of the panel of experts, has been the assertion that these amendments are noncontroversial. This is utterly inaccurate. It is true that some of these or similar amendments are to be found both in the committee bill and in S. 748, the administration bill. It is also true that some of them were in the Kennedy-Ives bill which passed the Senate in 1958. But it was precisely their presence in the Kennedy-Ives bill which contributed to last year's defeat of that measure in the House, and that itself constitutes substantial proof of their controversial nature. In any event, if clearer proof were needed there is not a single one of these irrelevant Taft-Hartley amendments in either bill which does not find labor and management irreconcilably opposed to each other on the question of their desirability.

We therefore recommend that these irrelevant Taft-Hartley amendments, by which we mean every amendment to that statute except the four we have enumerated above, be stricken from the committee bill or rejected by the Senate when offered as amendments on the floor.

POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS AND EXPENDITURES BY LABOR UNIONS

Despite his unique leadership and outstanding eminence in the field of labor reform, resulting from his activity as chairman of the rackets committee, the minority reports with regret that no provision of Senator McCLELLAN's labor reform bill, S. 1137, or his other bills dealing with necessary and relevant Taft-Hartley changes, was discussed by the committee except for one or two of a minor nature offered as amendments by the minority.

We therefore strongly urge the Senate to give to these measures on the floor the careful consideration they deserve and which they were never given in committee through any action in that direction by any member of Senator McCLELLAN's own party.

We of the minority are especially interested in a provision of his bill, S. 1137, dealing with a problem which, in our opinion, has a direct and substantial bearing on labor union reform, particularly on the subject of labor union democracy.

It is no longer possible to deny what every well-informed observer knows, that the labor movement has grown from a puny infancy to a lusty and stalwart maturity. The power and influence which the labor union wields over its own membership and exerts in the political, as well as the economic sphere, is becoming increasingly irresistible. There is a widespread recognition among the knowledgeable that in areas where the labor movement is well entrenched, its membership, with or without the aid of the compulsory unionism required under union security contract provisions, has increasingly become a captive membership (see quotations from Profs. Clark Kerr and Clyde Summers in appendix D).

For these reasons it seems imperative to us that the Congress seriously consider the need for legislation in connection with the growing political activities of labor unions. Existing Federal law on the subject is applicable solely to these activities in connection with Federal elective office, and is entirely inapplicable to such activities in connection with State and local political campaigns and elections. Very few States either limit or prohibit these activities, and judicial decisions have demonstrated the inefficacy of existing Federal law on the subject. Unless these activities are regulated and curbed by effective Federal legislation, there is danger that union political power may eventually become so overwhelming as to be able to sweep all before it, abridging individual civil rights in the process.

Section 304 of the Taft-Hartley Act amended the Federal Corrupt Practices Act to make it unlawful for corporations and labor organizations to make any contribution or expenditure in behalf of any candidate for Federal office. This provision has proved to be largely ineffectual insofar as unions are concerned.

The only bill presently before the Senate which deals with the subject is S. 1137 introduced by Senator McCLELLAN. Section 412(a) of that bill makes it unlawful for any labor organization, or any officer, agent, or representative of such organization to make any contribution or expenditure out of money, trust funds, or other property of such labor organization if the purpose is to influence voters or affect the results of any election, party primary, convention or caucus, or to make any contribution out of such money, funds or property to or in behalf of, any candidate.

It is also made unlawful for any labor organization or its officers and agents to coerce or attempt to coerce any member of the labor organization to contribute services or money to any party, committee organization, agency, or person for the purpose of affecting the results of such election, primary, etc. The bill expressly provides that nothing therein shall impair the right of individual officers or members to vote, express their opinions on political subjects or to contribute their own services or money for political purposes.

If the Senate enacts legislation which preserves union funds for the purposes for which they are created, it is difficult to imagine how it can ignore a widespread abuse which strikes so directly at the civil rights of the members. Compulsory unionism can constitute a dangerous restriction on freedom, but the deadliest danger comes from a subtle extension of compulsory unionism into the political area. We are talking about the regular deduction from a man's pay for political purposes. The union member, on pain of dismissal from his job, is, in effect, required to sign a blank political check for the union leader. The union official then disposes of the worker's money in such political campaigns as he, the union official, sees fit.

There is nothing to stop the union official from using the member's own money to support political candidates which the union member himself opposes. In other words, that union member may go down to the polls and vote for a candidate who is, at the same time, being opposed by the union leader; but the union leader is nullifying to a degree the franchise of such a union member by requiring him to contribute money which the union official can then use against his chosen candidate.

Which is worse—to prevent a man from voting, or on the other hand, to let him vote but compel him, at the same time, to supply political funds which may be used against his chosen candidate? There are millions of union members in this country today who are making forced political contributions on pain of losing their jobs. They are the new second-class citizens in America. They are the citizens whom we, by law, have turned over not only to the economic but to the political mercies of a small group of union politicians. This is a new serfdom, where a citizen is required to surrender a portion of his freedom of political choice to a union politician or be discharged from his job on the grounds of failure to pay his dues.

The commitee bill has been heralded as a bill which would reduce the power of the union boss. There could be no greater power than complete political power. We believe the provisions of Senator McCLELLAN's bill, S. 1137, dealing with the use of union funds for political purposes, should be added to the committee bill as a further and most essential safeguard for the civil liberties of union members. We agree that there should be no restrictions upon an individual union member in contributing his own money or his own time for political purposes.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

The committee bill would become an effective labor reform measure if it cleaned up the "gimmicks" described in appendix B, dropped irrelevant Taft-Hartley revisions, and adopted amendments in the following areas:

(1) Imposed fiduciary obligations, enforcible by union members, on the officials of labor unions.

(2) Imposed the effective sanctions of denial of tax immunity and of access to the National Labor Relations Board, the National Mediation Board, and so forth, on unions which violate the bill's provisions.

(3) Solved the problems arising out of the no man's land by permitting the States to exercise jurisdiction in those classes of labor cases which the Federal Labor Board would refuse to entertain.

(4) Limited organizational and recognition picketing by unions which clearly do not represent a majority of the employees of the picketed employer.

(5) Closed the loopholes in the present law dealing with secondary boycotts.

(6) Limited effectively political expenditures and contributions by labor unions.

We intend either to offer or support on the floor of the Senate, appropriate amendments based as far as possible on the bills S. 748 and S. 1137, which are designed to achieve these minimum objectives.

UNIONS OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

In addition we propose to offer or support an amendment to correct an inequity in the committee bill, the import of which seems to have escaped the attention of all of the members of the committee. As the bill now reads labor unions whose membership consists of Government employees and whose employers are governmental bodies or agencies of any kind, Federal, State, local, municipal, etc., are subject to all the requirements, restrictions, and limitations of the bill.

On the other hand, these unions and their Government employee members (of whom there are about 2½ million) receive few or none of the benefits under existing labor law, both State and Federal. They are completely excluded from the coverage of the Taft-Hartley Act and thus are denied the rights and benefits extended to members of nongovernmental unions, and as far as Federal employees are concerned, are specifically denied the right to strike. Similar limitations on the union activities of governmental employees are well-nigh universal at every level of government throughout the Nation.

Thus the overwhelming majority of Government employees are denied the right to strike or picket, are denied protection against discrimination in employment because of union activities, cannot compel their governmental employers to bargain collectively or to enter into collective bargaining agreements even when their unions represent a majority of the employees in a unit, cannot attain exclusive representation status, and cannot, through their unions, secure union security arrangements requiring membership as a condition of continued employment, such as are authorized by the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Hence, these Government employee unions, if not taken out from under the requirements of the committee bill, would be the victims of an inequitable statutory arrangement whereby they would find themselves subject to many Federal regulations and controls without being extended the benefits and rights enjoyed by other types of labor organizations under Federal law.

But even more important than the elimination of an unjustifiable inequity is the need for vindicating a most fundamental principle which underlies a free society. It is our firm conviction that the existence and continued development of genuinely voluntary social organizations, not dependent on Government and free from Government regulation, is an essential condition of a healthy democratic society.

Labor unions of governmental employees such as we have described meet every test of what constitutes a genuinely voluntary, private association. They have no power of any kind, statutory, economic, or otherwise, to compel anyone to join, or their members to remain such. They are completely dependent upon the voluntarily extended support of their members for their continued existence, and must in turn justify such support by the continued service they render their members. Any misconduct, dereliction, or corruption is well guarded against by the right of each member to withdraw from the organization, thus cutting off its only sources of revenue. As a result, corruption, racketeering, gangsterism, find it well nigh impossible to gain a foothold. As a matter of fact, we do not know of a single instance in which these evils have been found to exist in a union of Government employees, and we are reliably informer that in all the years of their existence, no Government union has ever imposed a trusteeship over a local or subordinate body.

For these reasons we shall offer and support on the Senate floor an amendment to exclude unions of Government employees from the coverage of the committee bill.

APPENDIX A

MINORITY AMENDMENTS ADOPTED BY THE COMMITTEE

The minority was successful in having some of their amendments adopted by the committee and to this extent have somewhat improved the bill by closing several loopholes and correcting some omissions and deficiencies. But the committee bill, despite the addition of the minority amendments, is still woefully inadequate to achieve a minimum of necessary labor reform.

The amendments successfully offered by the minority and described below appear in italic.

Section 101(a): This section requires a union to file with the Secretary a copy of its constitution and bylaws and a report, both signed by its officers. Our amendment requires the union officers to sign the copy of its constitution and bylaws as well as the report.

Section 101(a)(1): This report must contain the name of the union and address of its principal place of business and, if different, the address where its books and records are kept. Where the books and records of the union are housed separately from the union's headquarters, our amendment also requires the address where the books and records are kept.

Section 101(a)(3): The report must set forth the initiation fee or fees which are required of new or transferred members by the constitution. Our amendment thus broadens the filing requirement to include fees charged transferred members from other locals. If the fee scale for transferred members differs in any way from that for new members, a very common practice, this information should be made known to the union members.

Section 101(a)(5): This subsection requires the union to file a detailed statement covering the union's internal operations and procedures. It did not, however, require any information as to the procedure for disciplining or removal of union officers or agents. Our amendment requires such a report.

Further, the union must report on the constitution's procedure for imposition of fines, suspensions, and expulsions of members, including the grounds upon which such action may be taken and any provision made for notice, hearings, judgment on the evidence, and appeal procedure. Our amendment thus broadens the requirement to include fine and suspension of members and any provision for notice, hearing and appeal.

Section 101(b)(3): The union must file a financial statement listing the salaries, allowances and other direct or indirect disbursements to each officer and also to each employee who received more than $10,000 in the aggregate. Under this section as originally worded, gifts, gratuities and other special favors (not covered by salaries or allowances) need not have been reported. The adoption of our amendment plugs this loophole.

Section 101(b)(4)(5): The report must contain a detailed statement of loans to union officers, employees, or members and also to any business enterprise together with a statement of the purpose, security, and arrangements for repayment. If it is important for the members to know about the security and repayment of the loan, it is even more important that they know the purpose of the loan. Our amendment gives the union members this information.

Section 102: Union officers and employees must file a report on any income or other benefit with monetary value derived from a conflict-of-interest situation. Since there are many ways in which a person may have a conflict of interest without receiving what is technically income, our amendment plugs this loophole by requiring disclosure of any other benefit with monetary value derived by a union officer or employee from a conflict of interest.

Section 102(a)(4): Similarly, any union officer or employee must disclose benefits derived from a business which buys, sells, or leases to, or otherwise deals with his union. Inasmuch as the Kennedy-Ives bill of last year contained the words "otherwise dealing with," there is no rational explanation for the omission of this phrase from the Kennedy-Ervin bill. As Prof. Archibald Cox stated in his testimony before the committee this year:

"If the principle that a union officer should report any situation in which he stands to make a personal profit from a transaction with a union is sound as applied to a sale or a lease it is just as sound as applied to other business dealings. I urge that the committee restore the words omitted."

We agree with Professor Cox, and our amendment therefore broadens the language of the section by the insertion of the phrase "or otherwise dealing with" to cover every conflict-of-interest situation.

Section 102(a)(6): A union officer or employee must file a report covering any payment of money or other thing of value received directly or indirectly from any employer or his agent or consultant except payments referred to in section 302(c) of the Taft-Hartley Act. Our amendment requires a report covering any payment by an employer or his agent to a union officer or employee. This is in contrast to the original wording of the bill which required a report only on employer payments to a union officer or employee pursuant to an arrangement whereby the officer or employee would influence or affect employees in the exercise of their rights.

Section 102(c): No one need report under this section unless he holds or has held an interest, or has engaged in a conflict-of-interest transaction. Our amendment adds the words "or has held" in order to make it useless for an officer or employee to divest himself of any conflict-of-interest benefit in order to avoid the filing of such report.

Section 103(a)(1): This section requires employers to file reports covering payments to middlemen who are to persuade employees to exercise or not to exercise their rights. Under the original language no report would be required concerning an agreement where a middleman persuades employees to exercise their rights; i.e., to join a union. Information covering this type of an agreement requires disclosure as much as where the object of the agreement is to persuade employees not to join a union. Our amendment closes this loophole.

Section 103(a)(2): Among other things, this section exempts from the reporting requirement expenditures by an employer incurred in publishing in his own name a newspaper, newsletter, or other letter or communication, or advertisement. It is doubtful that the original provision would have been construed to cover advertisements by an employer and therefore our amendment clears up this doubt by including the word "advertisement" in the exemption.

Section 103(a)(4): This section, written into the bill by our amendment, requires an employer to file a report on any dealings he may have with a union officer or employee and which would require such officer or employee to file a conflict-of-interest report. It thus operates as a double check on both employer and union personnel conflict-of-interest cases.

Section 103(d): Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to require any other person to file a report unless he was actually engaged in a conflict of interest. Our amendment substituted "any other person" in place of "labor relations consultant" inasmuch as the bill does not contain a definition of "labor relations consultant."

Section 104(c): This section provides that the Secretary of Labor shall make available reports filed by any person to State agencies. For some unknown reason, the bill originally covered only labor union and employer reports excluding conflict-of-interest reports filed by union officers and employees. Our amendment substituting "person" for "labor organization and employer" covers conflict-of-interest reports of union officers and employees as well.

Section 105: Every person required to file reports under Sections 101, 102, and 103, must preserve the records under conditions prescribed by the Secretary. Section 102 reports are those filed by union officers and employees covering their conflicts of interest. Again, our amendment plugs this gap by requiring these records to be preserved.

Section 106(b): The Secretary is given authority to issue rules and regulations prescribing the form, time of filing, and publication of reports. No authority was originally given to the Secretary to prescribe the time of filing such reports. Our amendment corrects this omission.

The Secretary is also given authority to prescribe simplified reports where he finds that a detailed report would be unduly burdensome on unions by virtue of their size. In order to deny large unions the special privilege of being able to file simplified reports, our amendment limits the Secretary's authority to prescribe simplified reports only where a detailed report would be burdensome on the union because of its size.

Section 106(c): The Secretary shall have the power and is directed when he believes it necessary in order to determine whether anyone has violated or is about to violate a provision of this bill to make investigations.

As originally worded, this section would have given the Secretary the authority to investigate the books and records of persons reporting under the act only when he had probable cause to believe that a person had violated provisions of the act. On the surface, the term "probable cause" would appear to give the Secretary all the investigatory power that he needed. But the words "probable cause" would throw a monkey wrench into the Secretary's investigatory machinery. Probable cause means more than mere suspicion that the act has been violated. To have probable cause, a person must have such evidence as would lead the ordinary prudent man to believe that the act has been violated. Consequently, every time he commenced an investigation the Secretary could be dragged into court until the question of probable cause had been decided. Under nearly every statute requiring the filing of reports, such as the Internal Revenue Act and the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Administrator can conduct "spot check" investigations unhampered by the "probable cause" requirement. Our amendment rewrites this section to give the Secretary investigatory power when he believes it necessary in order to determine whether a violation has occurred or is about to occur.

Section 107(a): A labor union is prohibited from making loans to any officer or employee which results in a total indebtedness on the part of such officer or employee to the labor union in excess of $1,500.

As originally worded, this section would have prohibited a union from making loans to any officer or employee in excess of $1,500. The loophole here is quite obvious. The union could make an unlimited series of loans to one of its officers each in the amount of $1,499 without violating this section. Our amendment closes this loophole by prohibiting loans which result in a total indebtedness on the part of the officer to the union in excess of $1,500.

Section 107(b): Our amendment adds a new subsection prohibiting a union or an employer from paying the fine or costs of defense of any officer, agent, or employee indicted for or convicted of any violation of the act. If the person is acquitted he may be reimbursed for his expenses. Our amendment therefore prohibits the funds of the union or the corporation from being used in such an improper manner.

Section 108(c): A person who willfully conceals, withholds, or destroys any books, records, reports, etc., shall be subject to a fine and/or imprisonment. Making it a crime to destroy books and records takes care of only part of the problem. It should also be made a crime to withhold or conceal books and records and our amendment covers this situation.

Section 109(b): This section provides that a union member may sue a person convicted of embezzling union funds, only after the union has failed or refused to sue to recover these funds within 6 months after being requested to do so by the member. Under this section as originally worded a union could employ stalling tactics for an indefinite period during which the embezzled funds might be completely dissipated. Our amendment adds a 6-month time limitation so that the member can sue if the request is not granted within that time.

Section 110(c): Our amendment adds a new section to the bill authorizing the Secretary to bring suits in court to restrain or prevent violations of the act and also to compel compliance with the provisions of the act. Without our amendment, the bill would rely exclusively on criminal penalties to compel compliance. In many cases, criminal statutes have proved to be ineffective and our amendment partially corrects this weakness in the bill by giving the Secretary this additional authority.

Section 111: This section, making it unlawful to carry on extortion picketing, was originally made an unfair labor practice in the bill. But our amendment makes it a crime under section 302 of the Taft-Hartley Act. Also, as originally worded, this provision would have prevented a union from picketing for a pay increase or any other legitimate economic benefit. Our amendment corrects this faulty draftsmanship by insuring the union's right to engage in peaceful picketing for lawful objectives.

Section 201(a): This section requires trusteeship reports to be signed by the president and treasurer of the supervisory union, as well as the trustees. Our amendment substitutes the treasurer for the secretary and, in addition, requires the report to be signed by the trustees as well.

Section 310(b): Our amendment adds new language to the election section preventing the union and its officers from discriminating for or against any candidate with respect to the use of membership lists of the union. Our amendment would also provide for adequate election safeguards to insure a fair count of the ballot as well as the right of any candidate to have an observer at the polls and at the counting of the ballots.

Section 301(d): This section provides that a reasonable opportunity be given for the nomination of candidates and every member in good standing shall be eligible to be a candidate and hold office and to support the candidate of his choice, without being subject to penalty, interference, or reprisal of any kind by the union or its officers. This is a most important amendment submitted by the minority because to some degree it helps insure a democratic procedure in any election of union officers.

Section 302(b): The Secretary shall have the power to investigate complaints and where an invalid election is set aside, he shall supervise the conduct of the election or hearing and vote upon the removal of officers. Our amendment gives the Secretary the authority to supervise a hearing and vote upon the removal of officers. Further, the committee adopted our amendment which gives a court the power to preserve the assets of the union where a union election is being judicially challenged.

Section 302(c)(2): Where the court declares an election invalid and a new election is held or the proceeding is for the removal of officers, the Secretary shall certify the results of the election or the removal proceedings to the court for the issuance of a decree. Our amendment makes this procedure apply to the removal of officers as well as to the regular or usual election of union officers.

Section 303: This section provides that no labor union is required to hold elections with greater frequency than is required by this bill or its own constitution and bylaws. This means that a local union could continue to hold election of officers once every 5 years as provided by its constitution without violating the provisions of the bill even though the bill provides for elections at least every 3 years. This is a "gimmick" that the minority overlooked. The bill gives the appearance of requiring local unions to hold election of officers at least once every 3 years and internationals at least once every 5 years. But the language of this section provides the unions with an opportunity to amend their constitutions to require the holding of elections less frequently than provided in the bill, thus rendering the 3- and 5-year election provisions a nullity. It is the intention of the minority to offer an amendment on the floor to take care of this "gimmick."

Section 305(a): This section prohibits convicts from holding union office in certain cases (other than an employee performing exclusively clerical or custodial duties). Our amendment makes it clear that this prohibition does not apply to employees whose duties are purely clerical or custodial in nature.

Section 305(b): This section states that no person who is determined by the Secretary to have "failed to file" required information under the act can serve as a union officer. Our amendment substitutes "failed to file" for "violated" any provision of this title. The original language raises several points. First, the Secretary cannot determine who violates the act; that is for the court to determine. Second, where the Secretary did determine someone had violated the filing requirements, and the court subsequently finds the person not to have violated them because of, for instance, a proper plea of self-incrimination, that person would remain eligible to serve as an officer of the union. Our amendment rewrites this section so as to prohibit a person who is determined by the Secretary to have failed to file from holding union office, regardless of whether such failure to file is a "violation" of the bill.

This section also provides that a labor union or officer who knowingly permits a person to hold office in violation of this section would be subject to a fine and imprisonment. Inasmuch as an officer holds office by permission of the union and not through another officer, our amendment makes it a crime for the union for violating the act. Without this amendment the provision would, for all practical purposes, have been a nullity.

Section 504: Our amendment adds a new section to the bill authorizing the Secretary to enter into arrangements or agreements with other Federal and State agencies. This provision would permit the Secretary to utilize the facilities of these agencies in order to aid him in carrying out the purposes of the act.

Section 506(a): Our amendment adds a new subsection to the bill making it unlawful for a union, its officers or any agent, to fine, suspend, or otherwise discipline a member for exercising his rights under this bill.

Section 506(b): Again, our amendment adds a new subsection to the bill making it unlawful for any person, by the use of force, violence or economic reprisal, to restrain, coerce, or intimidate a union member in the exercise of his rights under the bill. These two amendments provide the most important safeguards in the bill for protecting union members against reprisals for exercising even such inadequate rights as the bill confers upon them.

Section 507: Nothing in this act shall be construed to impair or diminish the authority of any State to enact or enforce its own criminal laws. Our amendment adds this section to the bill in order to preserve the authority of the States to apply their own criminal law against possible preemption by the Federal Government.

Section 602(a): It shall not be an unfair labor practice for an employer engaged in the building and construction industry to make an agreement covering employees engaged in the industry with a union because (4) such agreement specifies minimum training. In many crafts only union members can receive apprenticeship training inasmuch as only the union provides such apprenticeship training. Thus, our amendment, by striking out the word "apprenticeship," prevents the legalization of closed shop agreements which are now illegal under Taft-Hartley

Section 606: Our amendment adds a new section to the bill authorizing the President to designate an officer or employees of the Board as acting General Counsel whenever a vacancy occurs in that office.

These amendments undoubtedly strengthen the safeguards for such rights as the committee bill bestows on employees and on rank and file union members. Unfortunately, however, the bill in fact, confers so few rights, and the few it appears to grant are so restricted and hedged about with difficult conditions and limitations, that the amendments successfully urged by the minority are like a stout lock on an empty strongbox. If the box had any treasure in it, the lock's presence would be invaluable. On an empty box the lock is meaningless.

APPENDIX B

THE "GIMMICKS" IN THE COMMITTEE BILL

Even if the committee bill effectively did every thing it appears to do, it would still be largely inadequate to accomplish the job of eliminating or even substantially diminishing abuses, corruption, and racketeering in the labor-management field. Its serious omissions in this respect, however, are considered in the body of the minority report. In this analysis the sole purpose will be to demonstrate that many of the provisions of the committee bill belie their own appearance, and in fact do not give employees and union members the rights, benefits, and protections which are claimed for them.

I. FIDUCIARY OBLIGATION OF UNION OFFICIALS (SEC. 2 (b))

The bill does no more than declare that it encourages the faithful observance of fiduciary responsibilities by union officials by requiring them to make certain financial reports. But by the use of the word "fiduciary" in what is in fact merely the bill's preamble, an impression is created that something is being done about the fiduciary obligations of union officials. A minority amendment imposing fiduciary status on union officials and giving union members a right to sue in the Federal courts for breach thereof was rejected.

II. WHO IS A UNION "OFFICER"?

The sanctions of the committee bill are exclusively criminal and are directed mainly at union "officers" who fail to comply with its requirements—reporting of financial matters, and regulation of trusteeships, and of union elections. The U.S. Supreme Court has held that a union's "officers" are only those officials who are so designated by the union's constitution and that function is not the test. Thus, a union can rewrite its constitution so as to have only a single officer, its president for example. That means that those officials who perform the duties of vice president, secretary, treasurer, business agent, organizer, manager, member of an executive board, or other union governing body are not "officers" and hence completely free from the bill's requirements or sanctions. A minority amendment defining "union officers" to include all of these governing or policymaking officials was rejected.

III. LOANS BY UNIONS TO UNION OFFICERS, MEMBER AND EMPLOYEES (SEC. 101 (b) (4))

Unions must report all loans to union members and officials aggregating more than $250. This enables the union leadership to make loans of $250 or less to favored members or officials, to deny them to those union people who for one reason or another oppose the leadership, and to act in this discriminatory fashion without letting the membership know about it. A more effective device for permitting an incumbent union leadership to use union funds for perpetuating itself in office is difficult to imagine. Nevertheless, a minority amendment was rejected to require reporting of all such loans regardless of amount, which by way of contrast is just what the bill requires with respect to loans made by a union to any business enterprise.

IV. CONFLICT-OF-INTEREST REPORTING BY UNION OFFICIALS (SEC. 102(a))

Section 102(a) requires every union officer and every union employee receiving an annual gross salary from the union of more than $5,000 (except mere clerical employees) to report any conflict-of-interest transaction as set forth in the bill. Generally, these transactions are such as to put the union man on both sides of a labor-management situation at the same time, and they thus constitute a breach of his duty to his union. Because of the lack of definition of "officer" in the bill, all union policymaking and governing officials not designated as officers in the constitution, and who, if they are on the union payroll, receive less than $5,000 per year, are freed from the requirement of reporting these fundamentally unethical transactions. This provides a gaping loophole for those dishonest union officials whose main source of income is derived not from their union salaries but from their conflict-of-interest transactions. A minority amendment was rejected to eliminate the $5,000 salary limitation which would have then required all nonclerical union employees to report these transactions. By way of contrast, however, the majority did knock out the $2,500 limitation on reporting of expenditures by employers for the purpose of influencing employees.

V. CONFLICT-OF-INTEREST BENEFITS DERIVED THROUGH A DUMMY OR STRAWMAN SETUP

A minority amendment designed to require reporting of benefits derived by a union official in a conflict-of-interest situation where the union official gets his unethical take from a third-party intermediary, was rejected.

VI. EXEMPTION OF SMALL UNIONS (SEC. 101(b))

Having agreed in subcommittee to a minority amendment eliminating the power of the Secretary to exempt small unions and employers from the financial reporting requirements, the majority, in full committee, put it back in again. Their argument was that such reporting would be burdensome to many small unions. However, the bill already contains a provision authorizing the Secretary to prescribe simplified reports where full reports would be burdensome. The result of retaining this exemption is to make it possible for some of the most corrupt unions, such as the Johnny Dio paper locals having few, or even no members, to evade the financial reporting requirements of the bill.

VII. INFORMATION IN REQUIRED FINANCIAL REPORTS TO BE MADE AVAILABLE TO UNION MEMBERS (SEC. 101 (C))

This provision sounds as if union members would be given the information necessary for them to keep their union officials honest. Nothing could be more deceptive. Neither the union member, nor even the Secretary, can tell by looking at one of these required financial reports whether it is accurate, erroneous, or deliberately falsified. In order to determine that, it would be necessary to compare the report with the basic union books, records, and accounts from which the reports have been prepared. It is only then that discrepancies might become evident. The bill fails to provide that union members be given access to these basic documents. A minority amendment to that effect was rejected. It was argued that the bill gives the Secretary access to these records and that is enough to assure that reports filed will not be falsified. This assertion is entirely unsound. The best source of information would be alert union members who had discovered falsifications after comparing the basic union records with the filed reports. Having no access to these basic records, union members are rendered largely useless as sources of information for such misconduct. The Secretary, under the bill, must rely either on the hit-and-miss method of spot checking a sampling of the filed reports or on complaints unsupported by concrete evidence. Which of these is he to investigate? No one can say. This omission renders the financial filing requirements of the bill almost entirely worthless despite its specious appearance of effectiveness.

VIII. PRESERVATION OF BASIC UNION RECORDS (SECS. 105, 108 (C))

The committee bill requires the making and preservation of the records upon which the filed financial reports are based and imposes severe penalties for their destruction or concealment. This adds to the impression that the bill's procedure for public disclosure of union financial affairs is being effectively safeguarded. But the very people who are most vitally concerned in the matter—the union members—are denied access to these carefully safeguarded records, a right enjoyed by corporate stockholders with respect to corporation records in almost every State in the Union. (See appendix C.)

IX. EMBEZZLEMENT OF UNION FUNDS (SEC. 109(a))

This makes embezzlement of union funds a Federal crime. Embezzlement of any kind is already a crime in every State and Territory of the United States, and there is no evidence that these local laws are not being properly enforced. This provision gives union members nothing they do not already have.

X. SUITS BY UNION MEMBERS TO RECOVER EMBEZZLED UNION FUNDS (SEC. 109(b))

Union members seem to be given the right to sue in a Federal or State court any union officer who has been convicted of embezzling union funds, for the recovery of such funds for the benefit of the union. But this right accrues so long after the act of embezzlement occurred that even if the suit is successful there is small likelihood that the stolen funds will not have been dissipated. Thus, the officer must first be suspected, then investigated, then indicted, tried, and finally convicted. Even then the suit can't be brought by the union member until 6 months after the union's officers have rejected his demand that they bring such suit themselves. The period between the indictment and the suit by the union member could easily span several years. Furthermore, this apparent right of the union member to sue is so hedged about by restrictions and limitations that he is far better off suing in a State court under State law. In most States he could bring suit as soon as the money was misappropriated; he would not need to wait even for indictment of the embezzling official; he would not have to show criminal intent; and he could secure a judgment upon a preponderance of the evidence rather than wait for a criminal conviction requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt. And finally the committee bill, as a further condition of bringing this suit, requires the union member to get leave of the court upon a sworn application and for good cause shown. These three additional conditions transform what appears to be a right to sue into a mere privilege dependent upon the court's discretion. Under State law, he could sue as of right without being subject to these conditions, conditions incidentally which the law imposes very rarely, only in unusual types of cases, and never heretofore in this type of legal action. Thus, upon examination, this so-called right to sue for recovery of embezzled funds turns out to be a snare and a delusion which no lawyer would ever advise his client to utilize. It should be added that the minority secured acceptance of an amendment preserving the remedies of union members under State law in this type of proceeding. Without this amendment, union members would have been stripped of their existing rights and given literally nothing in return.

XI. PAYMENTS BY EMPLOYERS TO REPRESENTATIVES OF HIS EMPLOYEES (SEC. 111)

The committee bill makes it a crime for an employer to give anything of value "to any representative of his employees." The Supreme Court has ruled that the term "representative" is not limited to a representative for collective bargaining purposes. Thus it is possible for an employer to commit a crime if he gives a material reward to the president of his employees' bowling league for his success in running a bowling tournament. Such president is a "representative of his employees" within the meaning of the bill. A minority amendment to eliminate this possibility was rejected.

XII. PAYMENTS BY EMPLOYERS TO UNION OFFICIALS (SEC. 111)

This section also makes it a crime for an employer to give or lend anything of value to an officer or employee of a union with intent to influence his decisions, actions or duties as a "representative of employees" (again that dangerous phrase) or as a union "officer or employee." If this were merely intended to outlaw bribery of union officials, that is already illegal under all State laws. But the term "influence" includes acts which are not technically bribery—what seems to be aimed at is prohibiting the subversion of union officials in the performance of their union duties. But why should such subversion be criminal only if it is committed by an employer, even if the employer and the subverted official's union have absolutely no relations with each other? (The bill's language includes such a situation in its scope). If the subversion of union officials is reprehensible and merits outlawing, why shouldn't it be outlawed regardless of who does the subverting? As the bill now reads, a Jimmy Hoffa or Dave Beck can subvert the president of the Retail Clerks Union by paying him to give up an organizing campaign so that the Teamsters can take it over, and no crime is committed. But if an employer in the steel industry gives something of value to his acquaintance, the head of a textile workers union, to persuade him to influence his union to change its political line, that would be a crime under the bill. A minority amendment to make it a crime for any person (not merely an employer) to subvert a union official was rejected.

XIII. EXTORTION TO PERMIT THE UNLOADING OF FREIGHT-CARRYING MOTOR VEHICLES (SEC. 111)

This section makes it a crime for a union of any of its representatives or employees to demand from a truckdriver or his employer a fee or charge for the unloading of the truck's cargo. This is extortion and is already illegal under State law and in all probability under Federal law (the Hobbs Act) as well. Hence, the extortion rarely takes this obvious form. What usually happens is that the union or union official seeking to exact a fee for permitting the truck to be unloaded, requires the operator to join the union and pay a sizable initiation fee even if he lives and works in another locality and belongs to another union, even if it is merely another local of the extorting union. This gives the deal an appearance of legitimate labor activity but it is nothing but disguised extortion. A minority amendment designed to outlaw this kind of racket was rejected.

XIV. EXTORTION PICKETING (SEC. 111)

This makes it a crime to picket for the purpose of compelling the picketed employer to pay off an "individual" in order to get rid of the picket line. Again, this is naked extortion and is already a crime both under State and Federal law (the Hobbs Act). Hence, this provision, like the previous one, is mere window-dressing designed to create an impression that the committee bill does something effective about certain indefensible types of picketing which are just as frequent as this type of "extortion picketing" is rare. It does nothing of the kind. Recognition and organizational picketing where the employees clearly do not want to be represented by the picketing union and which frequently is carried on to force the employer to violate the law by recognizing such a union is left completely untouched. Moreover, even within its own narrow scope, the provision is specious. The picketing is illegal only if it is for the enrichment of an "individual"—if the ill-gotten gains go to the racketeering union itself it is not illegal. And there is no illegality involved in threats to engage in such picketing nor in causing or attempting to cause others to so engage. Minority amendments to remedy these defects were rejected, and they remain to mislead the public into thinking that another labor abuse has been corrected.

XV. REPORTING REQUIREMENTS IN CONNECTION WITH TRUSTEESHIPS IMPOSED ON LOCALS BY INTERNATIONAL UNIONS (SEC. 201)

This section requires international unions to file reports giving specified information about any trusteeships over a local. The documents, books, records, etc., which the union makes or keeps and upon which these reports are based must not be destroyed or concealed. But union members (including even those in the trusteed locals) are not given access to these basic records and hence can rarely know if the filed reports are accurate or falsified. There is, moreover, no requirement that such basic records must be made and kept by the union in the first instance. The only applicable provision in this connection is section 105 which merely requires unions to make and keep basic records in connection with financial transactions. Inasmuch as the trusteeship reporting requirements include nothing of a financial nature, the only requirement is that they not be destroyed or concealed if the union chooses to make or keep them, which it need not do.

XVI. "PROBABLE CAUSE" IN CONNECTION WITH THE SECRETARY'S AUTHORITY TO BRING SUIT TO ENFORCE THE TRUSTEESHIP AND ELECTION PROVISIONS OF THE BILL (SECS. 204 AND 302)

At the insistence of the minority, an amendment was adopted giving the Secretary power similar to that of other regulatory agencies to investigate for violations of the bill's financial reporting requirements. This was done by striking out the restrictive phrase "probable cause" to believe violations had been committed and permitting the Secretary to investigate when he believes violations had been committed or are about to be committed. Retention of the original language, particularly the phrase "probable cause" would have completely nullified the Secretary's investigative effectiveness. Nevertheless, the restrictive phrase "probable cause" is still retained in two other significant parts of the bill. Section 204 gives the Secretary authority to sue in a Federal court to remedy violations of the bill's trusteeship provisions and section 302 to remedy violations of the provisions dealing with the election and removal of union officers. In each case, however, the same three conditions are imposed upon the Secretary's bringing suit. First, he must have a complaint from a union member; and second, he must have probable cause to believe (1) that a violation has occurred, and (2) that it has not been remedied. And just as the Secretary's power to investigate was limited by the phrase "probable cause" so is his power to sue on behalf of those complaining union members to whom the bill does not guarantee the access to the basic union records which would enable them to furnish the evidence necessary to meet the requirement of a showing of "probable cause." Thus, this combination of lack of access to basic union records coupled with the requirement to show "probable cause," in effect, renders the remedies under the trusteeship and election provisions almost wholly illusory. Suffice it to say that no comparable Federal statute in the labor field conditions a suit upon "probable cause," neither the Taft-Hartley, Fair Labor Standards, nor Walsh-Healey Acts. The bill's supporters rejected minority amendments to strike out "probable cause" as was done in connection with the Secretary's investigative powers, but no reason for this difference in treatment has yet been forthcoming.

XVII. RIGHTS OF CANDIDATES FOR UNION OFFICE (SEC. 301(b))

This section purports to guarantee rival candidates for union office the same facilities for reaching the membership as the incumbent officers. Senator PROUTY's proposal to give them access to the union membership lists for 30 days preceding the election was first accepted, then rejected in favor of a provision which does not give such access but purports to provide equal campaigning facilities for all candidates. The joker in this one is that the machinery all remains in the hands of the incumbent officers.

XVIII. "SECRET BALLOT" IN UNION ELECTIONS (SEC. 502(j))

This section defines "secret ballot" but does not exclude voting by proxy. A minority amendment to assure that proxy voting was prohibited was rejected thus leaving a loophole for election abuses.

XIX. PRESERVATION OF ELECTION AND CONVENTION RECORDS (SEC. 301)

This section requires union officials to preserve for 1 year all ballots, election records, credentials of convention delegates, and all minutes and other convention records pertaining to the election of officers. But again there is no provision requiring that access be given to these records to union members or even defeated rival candidates. Inasmuch as the Secretary can begin court action for violation of the election provisions only upon complaint of a union member, and upon a showing of "probable cause," it is obvious that his remedial powers are sadly restricted. How can a complaining union member secure evidence amounting to "probable cause" of a violation if he is denied access to the basic election records and documents? Again we have an appearance of a remedy without the reality.

XX. PREEMPTION OF STATE LAWS BY BILL'S ELECTION PROVISIONS (SEC. 303)

This section specifically preempts all State laws dealing with challenging a union election which has already been conducted, thus making the bill's provisions in this respect the sole remedy available to union members. The catch here is that many State laws provide more expeditious and effective remedies in this area than does the committee bill. A minority amendment to preserve remedies available under State law was rejected.

XX. UNION ORGANIZATIONS KNOWN AS CONFERENCES, JOINT COUNCILS, STATE AND DISTRICT COUNCILS, AND OTHER ASSOCIATIONS OF UNIONS (SEC. 571(h)(i))

The McClellan rackets committee hearings revealed that some of the worst manifestations of corruption and racketeering in the labor movement were to be found in organizations which are associations of labor unions rather than of individual employees, such as conferences, joint boards, State and district labor councils, etc. The most notorious example, of course, are the regional conferences into which the Teamsters are divided, particularly the Western Conference of Teamsters formerly headed by Frank Brewster. Associations of this kind are not labor organizations under existing law nor would they be under the committee bill for they do not bargain collectively, do not represent employees for collective bargaining purposes, do not enter into collective-bargaining agreements, and employees neither participate in their activities nor hold direct membership therein. Hence, these organizations, many of them extremely corrupt, as well as their officers and employees, are left completely untouched by the committee bill. Minority amendments to remedy this were rejected.

XXII. THE "NO MAN'S LAND" PROBLEM (SEC. 601)

"The "no man's land" is one of the most serious problems in labor-management relations. Senator KENNEDY himself has admitted that his own original proposal in his bill to compel the National Labor Relations Board to exercise all of its jurisdiction and take every case even if it was primarily local in character, is not an acceptable solution. Nevertheless the majority accepted Senator MORSE's amendment, now in the committee bill, which for all practical purposes, does exactly what the original Kennedy bill would have done but appears to be doing something different. It requires the Federal Board to assert all of its jurisdiction but permits it to cede jurisdiction (in cases which are primarily local) to the States to administer the Taft-Hartley Act but only through an administrative agency and not through the State courts. Under the provisions of the bill, these State agencies would be mere arms of the Federal Board subject to its control in every significant respect, and all judicial appeals would be through the Federal courts exclusively. To implement this provision would require every State in the Union to enact new legislation and 40 of them, which do not now have such an agency, to create one. Under normal circumstances it might well take decades before they all took the necessary legislative action. But the scheme so completely negates the sovereign character of the several States, that it is impossible to believe that any of them would voluntarily submit one of their independent governmental agencies, to the subordinate, even degrading status, to which the proposal would reduce them. But behind this completely unrealistic provision, hidden like a raisin in a cake, is the concrete fact that if the proposal is adopted, the Federal Board would be compelled to take every case affecting interstate commerce. The present timelag of the Board in case handling is about 2 years. This provision would extend it to 3, possibly 4 years. The small employer, his employees, and the unions which deal with them would be given a forum which they do not now have, but they still wouldn't get the quick and effective relief they so urgently need. The "no-man's land" would be eliminated, but the "no man's land" problem would remain as unsolved as it is now.

XXIII. COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN ATTORNEY AND CLIENT

From time immemorial the communications made by a client to his lawyer, like those between patient and doctor, priest and penitent, etc., have been regarded as sacred, and the right to keep these communications confidential is protected by law in every State in the Union. Some of the provisions of the committee bill, particularly those that require reporting by labor relations consultants, experts or advisers raise a problem in this regard because many of these people are lawyers and the people for whom they act are their clients. The American Bar Association within the past few weeks vigorously urged that the labor bills specifically protect this traditional aspect of the attorney-client relationship. The minority offered an amendment to that effect which was rejected, the argument being that it is already protected under existing law. As indicated, that is certainly true under State law—but it is questionable if Federal law would provide similar protection under the committee bill.

XXIV. REMOVAL OF OFFICERS (SECS. 301, 302)

Section 301(g) provides that if the Secretary, upon application of a member of a local union, finds that the constitution and bylaws of such local union do not provide an adequate procedure for the removal of an elected officer guilty of serious misconduct, such officer may be removed by the local's members so voting in a secret ballot election. The procedure allegedly provided for bringing this remedy into play is to be found in section 302. That section authorizes the Secretary to bring a civil action against the local union in a Federal court upon a complaint of a member of the local alleging that section 301 has been violated (i.e., that there is no adequate procedure for removal of officers in the local's constitution and bylaws) including violation of the constitution and bylaws of the labor organization pertaining to the election and removal of officers. Despite the italicized language which was added at the insistence of the minority, the phraseology of this provision (sec. 302(a)) is, at best, ambiguous in the extreme. It is exceedingly doubtful whether the Secretary is authorized to act on a complaint of a union member that his local's constitution and bylaws do contain an adequate procedure for the removal of officers, but the local or its officers is nevertheless refusing to comply with its own prescribed procedures in that regard. A close scrutiny of the language leads almost inevitably to the conclusion that these provisions establish a remedy in the courts through the Secretary only where the local's constitution and bylaws fail to provide an adequate procedure for removal of the local's elected officers, but do not give judicial relief where such a procedure exists but the local refuses to apply or follow it. The minority urged that section 301(g) be modified to permit the Secretary to sue in the courts upon a finding that an adequate procedure was lacking or, where it was provided was not being followed, but the majority would not agree.

XXV. ALLOCATION OF JURISDICTION AS BETWEEN THE STATES AND THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AS CONTAINED IN VARIOUS PROVISIONS OF THE COMMITTEE BILL

The committee bill distributes its remedies as between the States and the Federal Government in accordance with no discernible standard or consistent principle. Some remedies are exclusively Federal, some are left to the States and denied to the Federal Government, some are given to the States but only if they apply Federal law, and some are allocated to both the States and Federal Government. In some instances, the majority insisted upon exclusive Federal jurisdiction asserting that absolute uniformity was essential; in others, it was insisted that diversity of treatment under varying State laws was absolutely necessary. The following are the eight major provisions in which an allocation of jurisdiction was made:

1. Fiduciary obligations: The bill creates no Federal fiduciary obligation or remedy. This is left entirely to the States, which in fact, have no statutory law on the subject and very little case law. Interestingly, New York State has just enacted a labor reform bill which imposes stringent fiduciary obligations on union officials and gives union members themselves the right to sue for breach thereof. But the New York State AFL–CIO, the largest State labor federation in the country, with over 2 million members, opposed the bill, its principle objection being that State governments should permit the Federal Government to enact a law that would have a uniform effect throughout the country. This is exactly the reverse of the position taken by the majority in committee on the subject of fiduciary obligations and remedies.

2. Suits to recover embezzled union funds: But, having taken this position on fiduciaries, the majority did an about-face and made an exception permitting union members to sue in either State or Federal courts under Federal law to recover embezzled union funds while preserving their right to bring a similar suit under State law in State courts. No reason for the difference in treatment is discernible.

3. Embezzlement of union funds: This is made a Federal crime while preserving the right of the States to prosecute in State courts as a State crime.

4. Extortion picketing: This adds a new Federal crime although it is already a crime under State law (which is not preempted) and probably a Federal crime as well under the Hobbs antiracketeering statute. What the effect is on the Hobbs Act, nobody knows.

5. Extortion to permit unloading of trucks: Adds a new Federal crime although it is already a crime under State law (which is not preempted) and probably a Federal crime as well under the Hobbs Act, the effect upon which again is unknown.

6. Trusteeships: (a) Creates a Federal court action by the Secretary of Labor for violation.

(b) Doesn't preempt State law remedies, but if a union member chooses the Federal remedy (through a suit by the Secretary) he can't use the State remedy.

7. Election safeguards: (a) Creates a Federal court action by the Secretary to challenge an election which has already been held and preempts any similar State remedy. The Secretary's remedy is exclusive and is the only one the union member may use—he loses his State remedy.

(b) But if there are abuses in connection with an election prior to its being held, the bill provides no Federal remedy at all. The union member's only relief can come only through whatever State law may exist on this subject.

8. The "no man's land": Here, everything is turned over entirely and exclusively to the Federal Government with a single unrealistic exception that the States may administer the Federal law only (Taft-Hartley) through administrative agencies and not the courts. These agencies would be virtually arms of the Federal Labor Board with little or no independent power or status, and in any event would be permitted to take only those cases which are primarily local in character, and where although technically there was an effect on interstate commerce, such effect was remote and insubstantial.

APPENDIX C

DISCLOSURE OF CORPORATE FINANCIAL AFFAIRS

Aside from voluntary disclosures by many leading corporations to their shareholders and through their trade associations to the general public, there are mandatory or quasi-mandatory reporting requirements under State and Federal laws or under contractual agreements.

For the latter type, reference need only be made to the requirements of the New York Stock Exchange and other leading security exchanges. In order for a security to be listed the corporation must file an extensive preliminary statement of corporate conditions (capital stock setups; purpose of issue; character and application of the proceeds; a detailed list of subsidiary and controlled corporations; indebtedness; property owned; output for preceding 5 years; dividends owed or declared; balance sheets, income and surplus accounts of prescribed form and content) and agree to furnish prescribed annual reports (periodic statements of earnings, a balance sheet, income statement and surplus account).

STATE LAWS

Under State laws several methods are used to protect investors and the general public through various reporting and disclosure requirements. So-called blue sky laws are of two main types: fraud acts and regulatory acts. Virtually every State requires registration of new securities and filing of statements of corporate situation as a condition of the right to sell new securities within the State. The following State requirements are typical. This listing is not an exhaustive one.

SALE OF SECURITIES

Alabama: Every issuer whose securities have been registered must file periodic reports with the commission (attorney general), who is authorized to subpena witnesses, examine them under oath, inspect records of issuer, investigate complaints * * *. The records of the commission are open to the public * * *.

Arizona: Registration required of officers or issuers includes statement of corporate structure, amount of securities outstanding and financial statements.

Arkansas: Detailed information must be submitted by corporation to State bank commissioner prior to sale of covered securities. Such information is open to the public.

California: No sale or offer of sale of covered securities is permissible without a permit of the corporation commissioner after filing required information giving full details.

Colorado: Issuers of securities within the scope of the act must file prospectus with commissioner of securities within 12 months next preceding offering: name and address of issuer; date business commenced; location and nature of undertaking; details of capital; classes of securities, of stock and payment; amount of proposed issue and application of proceeds; details of organization expenses, if venture is less than 3 years old * * *. Statement of the interest of each director in property and compensation agreement with salesmen.

District of Columbia: Covered by Federal Securities and Exchange Act.

Florida: Has adopted the uniform Sale of Securities Act with slight revisions.

Georgia: Unless registered under Federal Securities Act of 1933, securities must be registered with the secretary of state and prospectus must include: name and address of main office of issuer; title and amount of securities; total offering price; * * * balance sheet certified by independent certified public accountant * * * profit and loss statement for 3 years back * * *.

Idaho: Law requires full information concerning securities to be sold to be filed with the department of finance.

Illinois: Covered securities must be registered by "notificattion," "description," or "qualification."

Iowa: Report required must include a balance sheet, statement of income, expenses and fees for fiscal year, plus a certified copy of articles, amendments, and bylaws.

Moreover, many States require the filing of periodic reports with the secretary of state and compel the directors to lay annual balance sheets before the stockholders. Reference need only be made to sections 47–50 of chapter 156 of the Massachusetts General Law:

ANNUAL REPORTS

"SEC. 47. Time; content.

"Every corporation shall annually * * * prepare and submit to the commissioner a report of condition which shall be signed and sworn to * * * stating:

"1. The name of the corporation.

"2. The location (with street address of its principal office * * *).

"3. The date of its last preceding annual meeting.

"4. The total amount of its authorized capital stock * * * the amount of stock with par value * * * without par value, issued and outstanding and the amount paid thereon * * *.

"5. The names and addresses of all the directors and officers of the corporation, and the date on which the term of office of each expires.

"6. A statement of assets and liabilities of the corporations as of the date of the end of its last fiscal year, to be made in such forms as the commissioner shall prescribe.

"SEC. 48. Approval of commission, filing; public inspection. * * * the State secretary * * * shall receive and preserve it (the report) in book form convenient for reference and open to public inspection.

"SEC. 49. Auditor's statement; selection of auditors; filing of statement * * * a corporation which has issued capital stock of one hundred thousand dollars or more * * * shall file (accompany its report to the commissioner) a written statement on oath by an auditor that such report represents the true conditions of the affairs of such corporation * * *.

"SEC. 50. Failure to file; penalty. * * * If a corporation fails for two successive years to file its annual report of condition the supreme judicial court * * * may decree a dissolution of the corporation."

A partial list of other State requirements for annual reports follows:

Alabama: Corporation must file annual report giving names and addresses of residents of Alabama who hold its shares of stock and outstanding bonds on specified date over the past 5 years.

Alaska: Annual report: amount of capital stock and amount actually issued; amount of debts; amount of assets; names and addresses of directors and officers.

Arizona: Annual report: assets, liabilities, accumulations, capital stock paid up and issued, all real and personal property and situation of same. Corporation commission has power to supervise and regulate all public service corporations, and to inspect books, papers, business methods and affairs of corporations offering stock to the public (Arizona Constitution, art. XV, sec. 4).

Arkansas: Annually on forms prescribed by public service commission.

Colorado: Annually with secretary of state to include indebtedness of corporation and all other information necessary to show financial condition of corporation.

Connecticut: Annually from corporations organized under joint stock law and certain specially chartered corporations with the secretary of state.

District of Columbia: Annually to contain, in general, same but current information included in certificate.

Florida: Annually to contain in addition to specified data, all other such information as may be necessary for the secretary of state to have in carrying out the provisions of the law.

Georgia: Annual report to secretary of state showing name, where, when, and by what authority incorporated, amount of capital stock, nature of business, and location of principal office.

Idaho: Annual report must include only information as to stock.

Illinois: Reports must be on forms prescribed and furnished by the secretary of state.

Indiana: Every corporation must file with the secretary of state, annually, a report of the condition of the corporation.

Iowa: Annual report must include name and addresses of corporation, amount of capital stock authorized, amount issued and outstanding, its par value, and amount of common and preferred; names and addresses of officers and directors.

Kansas: Annually to the secretary of state; it must include, among other things, assets and liabilities and changes, if any, since last report.

Michigan: Reports annually must contain sufficient information to show condition of corporation at close of last fiscal year.

Missouri: Annual reports must include balance sheet as of preceding fiscal year and special reports as to the financial condition may be required at any time.

New Hampshire: Annual report must include, among other things, the total assets and liabilities of the corporation and the report must be made on forms provided by the secretary of state.

Ohio: A financial statement must be made annually to stockholders and to State on prescribed form.

Oregon: An annual report must be made to the corporation commissioner on forms he supplies.

Pennsylvania: The annual report to stockholders must contain, unless otherwise provided by bylaw, a summary of assets and liabilities; deficit and how acquired or created; balance sheet, income and profit and loss statement ordinarily used by accountants for the particular business.

Without exception, stockholders in any State may require a corporation to open up the corporate books and records for inspection, at reasonable times and for valid purposes. This is a common law right which in some States has been expanded by statute, as Alabama, California, Colorado, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, Oregon, New Hampshire, Texas, Washington, and Wisconsin. This in many instances amounts to a publication of the information. Examples of several statutory requirements follow:

Alabama: Stockholder has the right of access to inspection of and examination in person or by agent of books, records, and papers of the corporation at reasonable and proper times.

California: A stockholder with 10 percent of shares represented at any stockholders' meeting must be granted access to books and records of the corporation.

Colorado: Stockholders have the right of access to the books and accounts at the office of the corporation.

Delaware: The proper manner of enforcing inspection of the corporate books is by mandamus.

District of Columbia: The shareholders owning an aggregate of at least 5 percent of all the outstanding shares must be granted access to the books and records of the corporation.

Idaho: The book of bylaws must be kept open to the public during business hours.

Illinois: Any person who has been a stockholder for at least 6 months, or shareholders holding at least 5 percent of outstanding stock must be granted access to all books and records of account, minutes, and other records.

The certificate or articles of incorporation originally filed before a corporation may be formed, must contain at least the following data in every State:

1. Name of corporation.
2. Objects of corporation.
3. Location of principal office.
4. Amount of authorized capital stock.
5. Period of duration of corporation, if any.

Examples of additional information that must be included can be seen in the following:

Alaska: The highest amount of indebtedness to which corporation may be subjected; the number of directors (at least three); names and residences of incorporators; any restrictions on the rights of particular shares of stock.

Arizona: By what officers the affairs of the corporation are to be conducted and the time when they are to be elected; the highest amount of indebtedness; whether the private property of stockholders is to be exempt from the corporate debts; the articles must be published at least six times in the newspaper in the county of the principal office.

California: Any restrictions on the rights of any class or issue of stocks; the number of directors (at least three).

Colorado: The preferences and rights of restrictions on each class of stock authorized; the names of the directors (at least three).

Delaware: The name and address of the resident agent; the capital with which the business is to be started, not under $1,000; a description of the classes of stock and preferences.

District of Columbia: The preferences and rights of each class of stocks; the minimum amount of capital for starting the business (not less than $1,000); any provision for the regulation of the internal affairs of the corporation.

Florida: The characteristics of every class or series of shares of stock; the amount of capital with which the business is to be started (not less than $500).

Illinois: Any provisions for the regulation of the internal affairs of the corporation and any restrictions on the rights of the stockholders.

Officers and directors must report

A director occupies a fiduciary or quasi-fiduciary relation to a corporation and its stockholders in the following States: Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wisconsin.

The director's position is one of trust and is frequently denominated a trustee under an implied or constructive trust, and held accountable in equity for his actions. He is bound to act with fidelity, the utmost good faith and subordinate his private and personal interests to his trust duty in the event of any conflict.

Generally speaking, this same relationship is applied as between an officer and a corporation or its stockholders. Officers are held to strict accountability and become personally liable for breaches of trust.

With both directors and officers, an accounting for activities can be obtained on proper motion in a court of equity by the stockholders. This is one of the best protections available to the stockholders.

Special State regulation

State regulation of insurance companies is chiefly through the licensing power. Most States provide for annual licenses. The control of the financial operations is exercised by the States chiefly through computing the reserve liability, computing the value of assets, controlling investments, controlling expenditures, and approving reorganization, reinsurance, and consolidation. (See Connecticut General Statutes, sec. 412; Georgia Code, sec. 56–810; Illinois Revised Statutes, ch. 72, secs. 596 and 775; Iowa Code, sec. 511.8(13); Kansas General Statutes, secs. 40–234, 40–409, 40–1109; Kentucky Revised Statutes, secs. 296.250 and 297.170; Massachusetts Laws, ch. 175, sec. 1–194; Minnesota Revised Statutes, secs. 60.68 and 65.01; New York Insurance Law, ch. 28, secs. 9, 20, 32, 86, 97, and 98; Ohio General Code, secs. 9351–9355; South Carolina Code of Laws, secs. 7944 and 7951; Wisconsin Statutes, secs. 203.33–203.49.)

FEDERAL LAWS

There are reports required of corporations under Federal law. The Securities and Exchange Commission requires annual reports and, in many situations, quarterly reports from every issuer of a security registered on a national securities exchange, covering information in detail concerning corporate earnings and expenditures, including remuneration of directors and officers. (See 15 U.S.C. 78m.) In addition to reports from corporations whose securities are listed on any national exchange, corporations with more than $2 million outstanding shares must file detailed reports. (See SEC forms 10K, 9K, 8K.)

Every registered holding company and every mutual service company covered by the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 must render detailed reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission on its financial condition, structure, and transactions, and permit the Commission to examine all books and records.

Electric utilities and natural gas companies

The Federal Power Commission has the power to examine the books and accounts of licensees. It may require licensees to submit reports. (See 16 U.S.C. 825.) This agency has jurisdiction over electric utilities engaged in interstate commerce or those on navigable waters or public lands. This agency also exercises jurisdiction over natural gas companies, from which it may require periodic and special reports and prescribe forms of accounts. (See 15 U.S.C. 717g.)

Telephone and telegraph companies

The Federal Communications Commission exercises broad authority over broadcasting, telephone and telegraph companies. Public disclosure of activities and internal operations of broadcasting companies is accomplished through the regular scrutiny of licenses. Similar control is exercised over telephone and telegraph companies by requiring complete publication through reports of any data. (See 47 U.S.C. 219 and 220.)

Banking

Federal control over the banking industry is exercised by the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Reports required of banks to the Federal Government, published in abbeviated form in newspapers, are the most compete of any corporate reporting forms. (See 12 U.S.C. 161–164 and sec. 481 among the other sections of title 12 of the United States Code.)

The Federal Trade Commission under 15 U.S.C. 46(b) may and does require of corporations in commerce to file annual and/or special reports or to answer in writing specific questions regarding the organization, business, conduct, practices, management and its relations with other corporations, partnerships, and individuals of the respective corporations.

Nowhere are more detailed and comprehensive reports made to the Federal Government than those required of railroads and motor carriers by the Interstate Commerce Commission. For all practical purposes the ICC has a duplicate set of books from every carrier subject to this jurisdiction.

APPENDIX D

THE FALSE DOCTRINE OF MUTUALITY IN LABOR LEGISLATION

When the legislation which became the Taft-Hartley Act was under discussion in 1947 labor unions for the first time raised the issue of "mutuality." They objected strenuously to the provision which became law in the Taft-Hartley Act, requiring officers of labor unions to file non-Communist affidavits with the National Labor Relations Board as a condition precedent to enjoying the privileges granted by the Taft-Hartley Act. It was their contention that this provision was discriminatory because the act contained no similar requirement with respect to employers.

From that day to this the unions have not only insisted upon the alleged discriminatory nature of this requirement but have developed a position which in substance holds that any legislative limitation or restriction imposed on labor unions must, to be fair, also be imposed upon management.

In the hearings on Taft-Hartley in 1947, the testimony and the evidence made it overwhelmingly clear that there were substantial segments of the labor movement which were either under the control of the Communist Party or were led by officers who were themselves either Communists or strongly sympathetic to communism. Not one shred of testimony was adduced indicating that a similar situation existed with respect to management. It seemed perfectly natural therefore to the Congress to direct its legislation to the area where the evil was known to exist and that no mechanical rule of mutuality need be applied.

In the hearings on labor legislation during subsequent sessions of the Congress the unions again insistently reiterated the doctrine of mutuality. Wherever proposed legislation is designed to correct some evil or abuse which has been found characteristic of the labor movement or of some particular segment of it, the labor union leaders have contended that no such legislation should be adopted unless similar limitations are imposed on management. It is the contention of this memorandum that "mutuality" as it has been raised is almost without exception a false issue.

The characteristics of organized labor and management, even in their relations with each other, differ so fundamentally that in only a few instances is it desirable to enact parallel requirements for each. What is more, despite the contention of the union leaders that failure to apply the doctrine of mutality constitutes discrimination, even a casual examination of the legislation on the statute books reveals that labor unions enjoy privileges and immunities enjoyed by no other private organization or institution, certainly not by management, and is free from the tremenodus volume of regulatory and restrictive legislation which applies to business exclusively. In other words, that labor itself is the beneficiary of a widespread lack of "mutuality."

A quarter of a century ago unions as contrasted with management were small and weak. Special immunities and privileges were deemed essential to establish some approach to an equality in strength. This, as has been indicated, has been achieved by an extensive regulation of business on the one hand from which unions are almost entirely free, and by the grants of privileges and immunities to unions which business does not enjoy.

During the past quarter of a century unions have grown strong, large, and powerful and the inequality from which they suffered as they faced management during the past, in most instances no longer exists. In a study published last year by the Fund for the Republic entitled "Unions and Union Leaders of Their Own Choosing." Clark Kerr, president of the University of California, former member of the War Labor Board, presently a member of the United Automobile Workers review board, and himself universally regarded as a top expert in the labor field, had this to say:

"A quarter of a century later—today—unions are well established and secure in most major industries of the Nation. Their members number 18 million. They can close down even the giants of American industry—General Motors and United States Steel. They negotiate 100,000 contracts covering the working rules that guide and govern important aspects of the life of industrial men in nearly every trade and every industry and nearly every town. Income, leisure, job security, retirement, pace of work, job opportunities, discipline—all are affected by union participation in the rulemaking process. And union influence extends outside the industrial government of the Nation into its political processes too. Unions affect the selection and the election of candidates. They are intimately woven into much of our economic and political life."

Having thus pointed out that labor unions are no longer the weak and ineffectual organizations of 25 years ago, President Kerr manifests his own skepticism with respect to the doctrine of mutuality. In the same pamphlet he points out fundamental differences between labor unions and corporations and in so doing clearly implies that the regulation of one need not be paralleled by an identical or similar regulation of the other.

"The great current issue is the impact of the union on the freedom of the worker. This issue is not simple; it is most complex. It is one that runs through all or nearly all of the union movement and is central to its very existence. While not unknown as an issue in the spheres of Government and the corporation, it is less intensely manifested there at the present time. Our Nation has had a long, successful experience in creating a democratic framework for our Government and protecting the liberties of individual citizens. Our corporations are not expected to be run on a democratic basis. They are founded on the model of the individual entrepreneur making his own decisions; and corporations seldom have either a captive labor force or captive consumers (when they do have captive consumers they are usually subject to State control).

"The unions are different. They have not had, like our Government, a long and successful experience in developing a system of checks and balances, in limiting their sphere of endeavor, in defining and protecting the internal rights of their members. Unlike the corporation, they are founded on the assumption of internal democracy. They are associations of individuals, not collections of capital funds. Moreover, increasingly they have a captive membership. It is usually not possible for a union member just to withdraw in protest, without penalty, if he does not like the organization, its leaders, or its policy. We have here, most frequently, a more or less compulsory organization with substantial impact on the lives of its members."
